 [EDWARDS (JOHN), a Divine of the Church of England, who flourished at the latter end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century. Finding that he was the author of a great number of publications, we solicited information concerning him through the medium of the "Gentleman's Magazine." The consequence of this was, our being favoured, by an anonymous benefactor, with a manuscript life of him, which appears to have been principally written by himself. Having received this intelligence relating to him, we cannot deny him an article, though we are now convinced that his works, notwithstanding their being undoubtedly learned, are too scholastic and calvinistical to be in any considerable degree the objects of present attention. He was born at Hertford, on the twenty-sixth of February, 1637, and was baptized in All-Hallows church in that town. His father was the Reverend Mr. Thomas Edwards, and, from the circumstances which are related concerning him, it is undeniable that he was the very Thomas Edwards, the violent Presbyterian Divine, of whom an account is given in the preceding article. The manuscript, that ascertains this fact, records, likewise, the time of his death, which, as well as the place of it, was unknown to our predecessor. He departed this life on the twenty-fourth of August, 1647, and in the forty-eighth year of his age. It appears that he died of a quartan ague in Holland, whither he had fled to avoid the resentment of the Independents, after Oliver Cromwell had come with his army in triumph into the city. By his wife, who was an heiress of a very considerable fortune, he left one daughter and four sons, the second of whom was John, the subject of the present narrative. After having received his grammatical education at Merchant-Tailors School in London, he was removed, in the year 1653, to the University of Cambridge, and was admitted of St. John's College, then under the government of Dr. Anthony Tuckney, a Presbyterian Divine of consequence at that period, and a gentleman of acknowledged character and learning. Dr. Tuckney was particularly distinguished for the wise and exact discipline of his college; so that it flourished in an eminent degree. Mr. Edwards, soon after his admission, was chosen scholar of the house, and he was quickly taken notice of for his exercises both in his tutor's chamber and in his college-hall. Towards the close of his undergraduateship, the senior Proctor being then of the college, he was appointed one of the Moderators for the year. When he was Middle Bachelor he was elected a fellow of his college, for which he was principally indebted to the exertions of Dr. Tuckney in his behalf. During the time of his senior bachelorship he was again chosen Moderator in the schools, and his performances were long remembered with esteem and praise. In 1661, Mr. Edwards was admitted to the degree of Master of Arts (a); soon after which event, Sir Robert Carr took him with him to Bugden, and presented him to Dr. Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, who conferred upon him the order of Deacon. That learned prelate engaged him, at the same time, to preach a sermon at the next Ordination of Priests, which was then approaching. This service he performed, and, together with the other candidates, entered into the second degree of the sacred ministry. In 1664, he undertook the duty of Trinity Church in Cambridge, and went through the whole work both parts of the day. In his preaching he affected not any flaunting eloquence, but studied to be plain, intelligible, and practical, and to edify all his hearers; yet so as that his Discourses were mixed with choice and uncommon remarks. His church was much frequented by the gown, and by persons of considerable standing in the University. Dr. Sparrow, Master of Queen's, Dr. Beaumont, Master of Peter-House, and Dr. Pearson, Master of Trinity College, were often heard to applaud his pulpit performances. In 1665, during the time of the plague, he quitted his residence in the College, and dwelt all that year, and part of the next, in the town, that he might devote himself entirely to the edification and comfort of the parishioners of Trinity church, in that season of calamity. A little after this, Sir Edward Atkins offered him a good a good living near Cirenceſter, in Glouceſterſhire, but he choſe to continue in his ſtation at Cambridge. In 1668, he was admitted to the degree of Bachelor in Divinity. About the ſame time, through the intereſt of Sir Robert Carr with Sir Thomas Harvey, Mr. Edwards was unanimouſly choſen Lecturer at St. Edmund's Bury, with a ſalary of a hundred pounds a year. This office he diſcharged with great reputation and acceptance, notwithſtanding which, after a period of twelve months, he reſigned it, and returned to his College. Here, however, his ſituation was uneaſy to him. He had not been upon the beſt terms with Dr. Peter Gunning, the former Maſter of St. John's, and he was ſtill more diſſatisfied with the conduct towards him of Dr. Francis Turner, Gunning's ſucceſſor. What were the grounds of Mr. Edwards's diſguſt, we are not able to aſcertain; but it was ſo great that he determined to reſign his Fellowſhip. On quitting his College, he was preſented by the Fellows with a teſtimonial of his worthy and laudable behaviour among them. From St. John's he removed to Trinity-Hall, where he entered himſelf as a Fellow-Commoner, and performed the regular exerciſes in the civil law. Being willing to be employed in the offices of his clerical function, he accepted of the invitation of the pariſhioners of St. Sepulchre, in Cambridge, to be their Miniſter; and his ſermons there were as much attended by perſons of conſequence in the Univerſity as they had formerly been at Trinity Church. In the year 1676, Mr. Edwards married Mrs. Lane, the widow of Mr. Lane, who had been an Alderman, a Juſtice of Peace, and an eminent attorney in the town. "This gentlewoman," ſays our narrative, "was an extraordinary perſon, of unuſual accompliſhments and ſingular "graces; but had the unhappineſs (as ſome others of that ſex) to be miſrepreſented "to the world. She being naturally of a high and generous ſpirit, and not framed to "low obſervances and vulgar compliances, incurred thereby the imputation of pride "and ſupercilioufneſs among vulgar minds. But thoſe who were no ſtrangers to good "breeding, and knew how to make diſtinction of perſons, admired the agreeable-"neſs of her converſation, and ſaw thoſe excellent and worthy things in her deport-"ment which they could find but in very few of her ſex. She underſtood herſelf and "her duty, and all the rules of civil and religious behaviour. She exactly knew the "laws of education; as was ſeen in her only ſon, whom ſhe bred up at home under "her own wing; a youth brought up to virtue and piety, and tainted with none of the "vices of the age."

Soon after Mr. Edwards's marriage, his friend, Sir Robert Carr, generouſly offered him the preſentation of two conſiderable benefices then vacant in Norfolk, which he as generouſly declined, being willing that thoſe livings ſhould be beſtowed upon ſome other perſon or perſons who needed them. About the ſame time he accepted a preferment leſs valuable, which was that of St. Peter's Church in Colcheſter, being induced to it by a proſpect of extenſive uſefulneſs. Thither he accordingly removed with his family, and was highly acceptable to his pariſhioners. However, he quitted the place at the end of three years, and removed to Cambridgeſhire. To this he was induced by the unkind uſage which (as he thought) he met with from the Clergy of the town; by the unhealthfulneſs of his lady; and by an apoplectic and convulſive fit with which he was himſelf viſited. Upon his removal into the county of Cambridge, being afflicted with bodily pains and weakneſſes, and eſpecially the gout, he determined to preach the Goſpel by his pen. Accordingly, from this period he employed himſelf in preſenting a ſucceſſion of publications to the world. About the year 1697, Mr. Edwards removed with his family to Cambridge, both for the convenience of the market, and the Univerſity-library. Our author had often been ſolicited by his friends to take his degree of Doctor of Divinity; but he did not comply with their motion till the year 1699. Upon this occaſion he had not the opportunity of keeping an act; becauſe, on account of the illneſs of the Divinity profeſſor, there was none to moderate and determine. He only preached an Engliſh ſermon at the commencement, and a Concio ad Clerum; beſides which he made a determination in Latin, in the ſchools, on a theological queſtion. In 1701, Dr. Edwards loſt his lady, and, after a due and decent diſtance of time he married again. The perſon he made choice of was a niece of Alderman Lane, and had been brought up ſeveral years under Mrs. Edwards before her marriage to the Doctor, which, ſays our manuſcript, "is a ſufficient character of this new conſort." It had been generally thought that his former wife laid a reſtraint upon him, and that, to comply with her, he debarred himſelf of his liberty, went very ſeldom into company, and, when he did ſo, ſtayed only a little time. But this, we are told, was a great miſtake, which was confuted by Mrs. Edwards's death; for, the Doctor kept the ſame courſe that he did before; made his houſe his reſidence; and cared not for the unneceſſary diverſions of company, but wholly ſeparated himſelf to ſtudy and contemplation. It is added, that the good effects of this conduct were ſeen in the books with which he continually bleſſed the world. It is remarkable that Dr. Edwards, notwithſtanding his numerous publications, was never poſſeſſed of a library; ſome bibles, lexicons, dictionaries, and other works, of a ſimilar nature and conſtant uſe, excepted. The Univerſity and College Libraries furniſhed him with all the claſſic Authors, and Greek and Latin fathers, and indeed with whatever related to ancient learning. Theſe he either peruſed in the places where they were kept, or had them brought to his chamber; and his method was, from the early part of his life, to make Adverſaria and Collections out of the books which he read, and all along to frame notes, obſervations, inferences, and reflections, from and on them, and to reduce them to the particular heads and ſubjects on which he deſigned to treat. He never had a common-place book. With regard to modern authors, his practice was to procure the loan of them from the bookſellers, at the price of ſixpence for an octavo, a ſhilling for a quarto, and two ſhillings for a folio. By this good huſbandry, he was forced to read the works which he borrowed within the time prefixed; whereas otherwiſe he might perhaps never have peruſed them thoroughly. Dr. Edwards continued in his courſe of diligent ſtudy, and repeated publications, till near the period of his deceaſe, which took place on the ſixteenth of April, 1716, in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age. A liſt of his writings will be given below [A].

Catharine, his ſecond wife, who is ſaid to have been adorned with every Chriſtian grace and virtue, ſurvived her huſband nearly thirty-nine years. She died on the fourteenth of January, 1744-5, aged eighty-one.

Of Dr. Edwards's piety a high, and, we doubt not, a juſt character is given in the manuſcript. However, that he had ſome faults of temper may not, perhaps, unreaſonably be ſurmiſed. It is certain that he did not live on the beſt terms with the generality of the Clergy. Dr. Gunning and Dr. Turner, ſucceſſively Maſters of St. John's College, and Biſhops of Ely, are ſpoken of, in our narrative, in ſevere language. Another perſon, who is repreſented in a very unfavourable light, is the gentleman who was Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity in 1711. This gentleman would not permit a ſermon, which Dr. Edwards had preached at St. Mary's on the fifth of November, to be printed

"A brief Vindication of the funda-"mental Articles of the Chriſtian Faith;" and a diſcourſe, entitled, "The Socinian Creed," 1696 and 1697. Theſe three pieces, together with ſome part of the treatiſe concerning "The Cauſes and Occaſions "of Atheiſm," were occaſioned by Mr. Locke's publication of "The Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, "as delivered in the Scriptures," and by the writings of ſome profeſſed Socinians. Mr. Edwards was the firſt perſon that encountered what he apprehended to be Mr. Locke's dangerous notions of the "One ſole Article "of Faith." This he did, in the beginning of the diſpute, in a manner very reſpectful to Mr. Locke's perſon and parts. But, Mr. Locke, in his two Vindications of his doctrine, having treated our author with ſeverity, he aſſumed, in his replies, an air of mirth and pleaſantneſs, and chaſtiſed his antagoniſt with ſome ſmartneſs. How far Edwards ſucceeded in his attempts at wit, humour, and raillery, we are not able to ſay. It is certain that his attack upon Mr. Locke was approved and applauded by a number of learned men, both at home and abroad. According to our manuſcript, Mr. Edwards obtained a complete victory in the controverſy; but there undoubtedly have been many perſons who have entertained a different opinion. One thing may be obſerved, which is, that our author's writings againſt Mr. Locke have ſunk into total neglect, while the "Reaſonableneſs of "Chriſtianity" ſtill continues to be read. By ſome of his contemporaries he was cenſured for appearing too frequently from the preſs. But his conduct in this reſpect is vindicated, in our manuſcript, from the examples of Cyril Alexandrinus, Chryſoſtom, Auguſtine, and Jerom, among the ancients; and Luther, Calvin, Brentius, Gerard, Melancthon, Druſius, Suarez, Albertus Magnus, Eraſmus, Vaſquez, Aquinas, Bellarmine, Baronius, the Magdeburgh Centuriators, and others among the moderns. It is added, that the profeſſors of other ſubjects and ſciences, the poets, the orators, the lawyers, and the phyſicians, acquire a greater ability and ſtrength by a frequent exertion of their talents. As to Dr. Edwards, it is ſaid, that thoſe who were juſt eſtimators of things cleared him of the imputation of writing too often, when they obſerved, that what he continually publiſhed exceeded rather than fell ſhort of his former performances.

at the Univerſity-preſs. In this affair the Vice-Chancellor evidently appears to have been influenced by a party ſpirit againſt our author, who was a zealous Whig; and who, in his diſcourſe, had enlarged much on our deliverance from Popery, on the bleſſings of the Revolution, and on the praiſes of King William. One thing which rendered Dr. Edwards unpopular among many of his brethren, was his great zeal for the Calviniſtic Doctrines. This matter he undoubtedly carried to a bigoted exceſs; for, he adopted and contended for the abſurd notion of the old Puritans, that there is a cloſe connection between Arminianiſm and Popery. That he was a man of extenſive learning cannot be denied; and, in the materials from which we have drawn up this article, he is ſaid to have been the Paul, the Auguſtine, the Bradwardine, the Calvin, of his age. It is farther aſſerted, that all unbiaſſed and impartial men voted him, by univerſal conſent, to be one of the moſt valuable writers of his time. If this aſſertion be true, and yet his works have fallen into oblivion, voluminous authors have reaſon to reflect, with ſome degree of humiliation, on the uncertain proſpects of future celebrity.]

 [EDWARDS (THOMAS), a critic and poetical writer, was born in the year 1699, in or near the City of London, and was a younger ſon of ——— Edwards, Eſq. a gentleman in the profeſſion of the Law (a). His grandfather had been of the ſame profeſſion. The principal part of his grammatical education he is ſaid to have received at Eton-School, where he became an excellent claſſical ſcholar, and laid the foundation of that good taſte in polite literature by which he was afterwards diſtinguiſhed. It is farther aſſerted, in the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer (b), that he removed from Eton to King's College, Cambridge. But, in the New Univerſal Dictionary (c) it is declared, that he was brought up at a private ſchool, and that he never was a member of either of the Univerſities. If he was a ſtudent at Cambridge, it is certain that he quitted his College without taking a degree. At a proper age he was entered of Lincoln's Inn, and, in due time, was called to the bar; but, having a conſiderable heſitation in his ſpeech, he was diſcouraged from engaging much in the practice of the law (d). Although he never appears to have fallen into that diſſipation which is ſometimes chargeable upon young gentlemen of the Inns of Court, it may be conjectured, from his ſubſequent publications, that he applied himſelf more aſſiduouſly to the cultivation of the Belles Lettres than to the ſeverer ſtudies belonging to his profeſſion. Shakſpeare, in particular, was the object of his warmeſt admiration and moſt ſedulous attention; and, to this circumſtance Mr. Edwards is principally indebted for his literary reputation. His firſt appearance from the preſs was in a pamphlet, publiſhed in 1744, and entituled, "A Letter to the Author of a late Epiſtolary Dedication, addreſſed to "Mr. Warburton (e)." This was the beginning of our author's attack upon that famous writer; which was followed, in 1747, by "A Supplement to Mr. Warburton's "Edition of Shakeſpeare," a performance ſo well received by the world, that two impreſſions of it were printed in the ſame year. A third edition of it appeared in 1748 (f), under the title of "The Canons of Criticiſm, and a Gloſſary, being a Supplement to "Mr. Warburton's Edition of Shakeſpeare. Collected from the Notes in that cele-"brated Work, and proper to be bound up with it. By the other Gentleman of "Lincoln's Inn;" which title the book has ever ſince retained. The expreſſion of "the other Gentleman of Lincoln's-Inn" refers to a previous controverſy of Warburton's, upon a different topic, with another member of that ſociety. Mr. Warburton, in the preface to his edition of Shakſpeare, declares, that it had been once his deſign to give the reader a body of Canons for literary criticiſm, drawn out in form, together with a gloſſary; but that he had laid aſide his purpoſe, as theſe uſes might be well ſupplied by what he had occaſionally ſaid upon the ſubject in the courſe of his remarks. This idea Mr. Edwards humouroufly took up, and from the notes and corrections of Warburton's Shakſpeare, has framed a ſet of Canons ridiculouſly abſurd, each of which is confirmed and illuſtrated by examples taken from the edition in queſtion (g). Every one will allow, that Mr. Edwards has perfectly ſucceeded in his attempt, and that through the whole of his work he has diſplayed his wit, his learning, and his intimate acquaintance with Shakſpeare. The "Canons," as enlarged in the later impreſſions, are twenty-five in number, and ſhall be given below [A]. It was not to be expected that our author's attack upon Warburton, though conducted

Accordingly, Mr. Warburton introduced Mr. Edwards into the next edition of Pope's Dunciad. It was in a note under the following lines in the fourth book of that work:

Next bidding all draw near on bended knees,
The Queen confers her titles and degrees.
Her children first of more distinguish'd sort,
Who study Shakespeare at the Inns of Court.

IV.

"Where he does not like an expression, and yet "cannot mend it, he may abuse his author for it." Nine examples.

V.

"Or he may condemn it, as a foolish interpola-"tion." Seven examples.

VI.

"As every author is to be corrected into all possible "perfection, and of that perfection the professed "critic is the sole judge; he may alter any word or "phrase, which does not want amendment, or which "will do; provided he can think of any thing which "he imagines will do better." Twenty examples.

VII.

"He may find out obsolete words, or coin new "ones; and put them in the place of such as he does "not like, or does not understand." Twenty-one examples.

VIII.

"He may prove a reading, or support an explana-"tion, by any sort of reasons; no matter whether "good or bad." Forty-nine examples.

IX.

"He may interpret his author so; as to make him "mean directly contrary to what he says." Twenty examples.

X.

"He should not allow any poetical licences, which "he does not understand." Three examples.

XI.

"He may make foolish amendments or explanations, "and refute them; only to enhance the value of his "critical skill." Three examples.

XII.

"He may find out an immodest or immoral mean-"ing in his author; where there does not appear to "be any thing that way." Three examples.

XIII.

"He need not attend to the low accuracy of ortho-"graphy or pointing; but may ridicule such trivial "criticisms in others." Thirty-seven examples.

XIV.

"Yet, when he pleases to condescend to such work, "he may value himself upon it; and not only re-"store lost puns, but point out such quaintnesses, "where perhaps the author never thought of it." Twelve examples.

XV.

"He may explain a difficult passage by words ab-"solutely untelligible." Four examples.

XVI.

"He may contradict himself; for the sake of "shewing his critical skill on both sides of the ques-"tion." Four examples.

XVII.

"It will be necessary for the professed critic to "have by him a good number of pedantic and abusive "expressions; to throw about on proper occasions." Sixteen examples.

XVIII.

"He may explain his author, or any former "editor of him; by supplying such words, or pieces "of words, or marks, as he thinks fit for that pur-"pose." Six examples.

XIX.

"He may use the very same reasons, for confirming "his own observations, which he has disallowed in "his adversary." Two examples.

XX.

"As the design of writing notes is not so much to "explain the author's meaning as to display the "critic's knowledge, it may be proper, to shew his "universal learning, that he minutely point out, "from whence every metaphor and allusion is taken." Thirty examples.

XXI.

"It will be proper, in order to shew his wit, "especially if the critic be a married man, to take "every opportunity of sneering at the fair sex." Eight examples.

XXII.

"He may misquote himself, or any body else, in "order to make an occasion of writing notes; when "he cannot otherwise find one." Six examples.

XXIII.

"The professed critic, in order to furnish his quota "to the bookseller, may write NOTES ON NOTHING; "that is, notes which either explain things, which "do not want explanation; or such as do not explain "matters at all, but merely fill up so much paper." Twenty examples.

XXIV.

"He may dispense with truth; in order to give the "world a higher idea of his parts, or of the value of "his work." Four examples.

XXV.

"He may alter any passage of his author, without "reason and against the copies; and then quote the "passage, so altered, as an authority for altering any "other." Two examples (1).

The "Essay towards a Glossary" is equally acute, and equally successful in exposing Warburton's Errors.

We are not, however, hence to imagine, that there is nothing but what is blamable in Warburton's Edition of Shakespeare. There are several remarks in it which are acute, ingenious, and beautiful. "That "it has good notes," Mr. Edwards says, "he never "denied (*)."

Mr. Edwards, who had inflicted ſo deep a wound on Warburton's edition of Shakſpeare, and who could be no ſtranger to the iraſcibility of his literary temper, ought to have been prepared for ſome ſuch attack. This, however, was not the caſe. Warburton's note, and the introduction by it of our author into the Dunciad, were felt by him in a very ſenſible degree; and he was particularly hurt at what he thought a reflection upon his birth. His reſentment on this occaſion was ſtrongly expreſſed in a preface which he prefixed to a new impreſſion of the "Canons of Criticiſm" [B]. In one reſpect

[B] In a preface which he prefixed to a new impreſſion of "The Canons of Criticiſm."] The truth of what is aſſerted above will be apparent from the following extract: "Mr. Warburton had promiſed the world a
"moſt complete edition of Shakeſpear; and, long
"before it came out, raiſed our expectations of it,
"by a pompous account of what he would do, in
"the General Dictionary. He was very handſomely
"paid for what he promiſed. The expected edition
"at length comes out; with a title-page importing
"that the Genuine Text, collated with all the former

"the great difficulties of the work, and the great
"qualifications requiſite to a due performance of it;
"yet at the ſame time he very cavalierly tells us, that
"theſe notes were among the amuſements of his "younger yēars: and, as for the Canons of Criticiſm
"and the Gloſſary which he promiſed, he abſolves
"himſelf, and leaves his readers to collect them out

"upon all the ſame paſſages as I did to collect them
"from; as perhaps no two people, who did not con-
"ſult together, would; but I defie him to ſay, that
"theſe are not fairly collected; or that he is unfairly
"quoted for the examples: if Mr. Warburton would "have been more grave upon the occaſion, yet I did
"not laugh ſo much as I might have done; and I uſed
"him with better manners than ever he did any "perſon whom he had a controverſy with; except
"one gentleman, whom he is afraid of; if I may ex"cept even him.

"But all this avails me nothing: I have read
"Shakeſpear at Lincoln's Inn; and have publiſhed
"my Canons of Criticiſm; and for this I am to be "degraded of my gentility. A ſevere ſentence this.
"—I find that my reading of Shakeſpear is a greater "crime than high-treaſon: had I been guilty of the "latter, I muſt have been indicted by my addition,
"tried by my peers, and ſhould not have loſt my "blood till I had been attainted; whereas here the "puniſhment is incurred ipſo facto, without jury or "trial.

"I might complain of Mr. Warburton to his "Maſters of the Bench, for degrading a Barriſter of "their houſe by his ſole authority; but I will only
"reaſon coolly with him upon the equity of this new "proceeding.

"A Gentleman (if I do not mean myſelf, with Mr.
"Warburton's leave, I may uſe that word), I ſay, a "gentleman, deſigned for the ſevere ſtudy of the law,
"muſt not preſume to read, much leſs to make any "obſervations on, Shakeſpear; while a Miniſter of "Chriſt, a Divine of the Church of England, and one
"who, if either of the Univerſities would have given "him that honour, would have been a Doctor in "Divinity: or, as in his preface he decently ex-
"preſſes it (2), of the Occult Sciences; he, I ſay, may "leave the care of his living in the country, and his
"chapel in town, to curates; and ſpend his Heaven-
"devoted hours in writing obſcene and immoral notes
"on that author, and imputing to him ſentiments
"which he would have been aſhamed of.

(2) Pref. p. 16.

"Who is Mr. Warburton? what is his birth, or "whence his privilege? that the reputations of men
"both living and dead, of men in birth, character,
"ſtation, in every inſtance of true worthyneſs, much
"his ſuperiors, muſt lie at the mercy of his petulant
"ſatire, to be hacked and mangled as his ill-mannered
"ſpleen ſhall prompt him; while it ſhall be unlaw"ful for any body, under penalty of degradation, to "laugh at the unſcholar-like blunders, the crude and
"far-fetched conceits, the illiberal and indecent re"flections, which he has endeavoured with ſo much
"ſelf-ſufficiency and arrogance to put-off upon the "world as a ſtandard of true criticiſm?

"After being degraded from my gentility, I am
"accuſed of dulneſs, of being engaged againſt Shake-
"ſpear, and of perſonal abuſe: for the firſt; if, as
"(3) Audrey ſays, the Gods have not made me poetical,
"I cannot help it; every body has not the wit of the "ingenious Mr. Warburton; and I confeſs myſelf not "to be his match in that ſpecies of it, which he deals-
"out ſo laviſhly in his notes upon all occaſions. As "to the charge of being engaged againſt Shakeſpear;
"if he does not, by the moſt ſcandalous equivocation,
"mean his edition of Shakeſpear, it is maliciouſly
"falſe; for, I defy him to prove, that I ever either
"wrote or ſpoke concerning Shakeſpear, but with "that eſteem which is due to the greateſt of our "Engliſh Poets. And, as to the imputation of per-
"ſonal abuſe; I deny it, and call upon him to pro"duce any inſtance of it. I know nothing of the "man, but from his works; and, from what he has "ſhewn of his temper in them, I do not deſire to "know more of him; nor am I conſcious of having "made one remark, which did not naturally ariſe
"from the ſubject before me; or of having been in "any inſtance ſevere, but on occaſions where every "gentleman muſt be moved: I mean, where his "notes ſeemed to be of an immoral tendency; or "full of thoſe illiberal, common-place reflections on "the fair ſex, which are unworthy of a gentleman or
"a man; much leſs do they become a divine and a
"married man; and, if this is called perſonal abuſe,
"I will repete it; till he is aſhamed of ſuch lan"guage, reſpect Mr. Edwards appears to have been miſtaken. Warburton had no reference to his parental origin; which circumſtance he condeſcended to explain in an additional note, though in very uncourtly language. "Lamentable," ſays he, "is the dulneſs "of theſe gentlemen of the Dunciad. This Fungoſo and his friends, who are all gen-"tlemen, have exclaimed much againſt us for reflecting on his birth, in the words, "a gentleman of the laſt edition, which we hereby declare concern not his birth, but his "adoption only; and mean no more than that he is become a gentleman of the laſt "edition of the Dunciad. Since, gentlemen, then, are ſo captious, we think it pro-"per to declare that Mr. Thomas Edwards's anceſtor is only related to him by the "Muſe's ſide (i)."

(i) Ibid.

Not ſatisfied with anſwering Warburton in proſe, Mr. Edwards pelted him with ſonnets. One of them may ſuffice, as a ſpecimen of the reſt.

"Tongue-doughty pedant; whoſe ambitious mind
"Prompts thee beyond thy native pitch to ſoar;
"And, imp'd with borrow'd plumes of index-lore,
"Range through the vaſt of ſcience unconfin'd!

"Not for thy wing was ſuch a flight deſign'd:
"Know thy own ſtrength, and, wiſe, attempt no more;
"But lowly ſkim round error's winding ſhore,
"In queſt of paradox from ſenſe refin'd.

"Much haſt thou written—more than will be read;
"Then ceaſe from Shakeſpeare thy unhallow'd rage;
"Nor by a fond o'erweening pride miſ-led,
"Hope fame by injuring the ſacred dead:
"Know, who would comment well his godlike page,
"Critic, muſt have a heart as well as head (k)."

(k) Canons of Criticiſm, ubi ſupra, p. 24.

Mr. Edwards had the leſs reaſon for being much affected by Warburton's reflection, as he had ample cauſe for ſatisfaction, in the repeated impreſſions of his work, in the approbation of his friends, and in the elegant Ode addreſſed to him by Dr. Akenſide [C].

"guage, as none but libertines and the loweſt of the "vulgar can think think to be wit; and this too "flowing from the fullneſs of his heart, where honeſt "Shakeſpear gave not the leaſt occaſion for ſuch "reflections." Other paſſages, to a ſimilar purpoſe, may be ſeen in the Appendix to the laſt Edition of "The Canons of Criticiſm."

[C] And in the elegant Ode addreſſed to him by Dr. Akenſide.]

'To Thomas Edwards, Eſq. on the late edition of 'Mr. Pope's works, 1751.

I.

'Believe me, Edwards, to reſtrain
'The licence of a railer's tongue
'Is what but ſeldom men obtain
'By ſenſe or wit, by proſe or ſong:
'A taſk for more Herculean powers,
'Nor ſuited to the ſacred hours
'Of leiſure in the Muſe's bowers.

II.

'In bowers where laurel weds with palm,
'The Muſe, the blameleſs Queen, reſides:
'Fair Fame attends, and Wiſdom calm
'Her eloquence harmonious guides:
'While, ſhut for ever from her gate,
'Oft trying, ſtill repining, wait
'Fierce Envy and calumnious Hate.

III.

'Who then from her delightful bounds
'Would ſtep one moment forth to heed
'What impotent and ſavage ſounds
'From their unhappy mouths proceed?
'No: rather Spenſer's lyre again
'Prepare, and let thy pious ſtrain
'For Pope's diſhonour'd ſhade complain.

IV.

'Tell how diſpleas'd was every Bard,
'When lately in the Elyſian grove
'They of his Muſe's guardian heard,
'His delegate to fame above;
'And what with one accord they ſaid
'Of wit in drooping age miſled,
'And Warburton's officious aid:

V.

'How Virgil mourn'd the ſordid fate
'To that melodious lyre aſſign'd
'Beneath a tutor who ſo late
'With Midas and his rout combin'd,
'By ſpiteful clamour, to confound
'That very lyre's enchanting ſound,
'Though liſt'ning realms admir'd around:

VI.

'How Horace own'd he thought the fire
'Of his friend Pope's ſatiric line
'Did farther fuel ſcarce require
'From ſuch a militant divine:
'How Milton ſcorn'd the ſophiſt vain
'Who durſt approach his hallow'd ſtrain
'With unwaſh'd hands and lips profane.

VII.

'Then Shakeſpeare debonnair and mild
'Brought that ſtrange comment forth to view;
'Conceits more deep, he ſaid and ſmil'd,
'Than his own fools or madmen knew:
'But thank'd a generous friend above,
'Who did with free advent'rous love
'Such pageants from his tomb remove.

VIII.

'And if to Pope, in equal need,
'The ſame kind office thou wouldſt pay,
'Then, Edwards, all the band decreed
'That future Bards with frequent lay
'Should call on thy auſpicious name,
'From each abſurd intruder's claim,
'To keep inviolate their fame (3).

(3) Johnſon's Engliſh Poets, Vol. LV. p. 274—276.

To the ſeventh edition of the Canons of Criticiſm, which was publiſhed in 1765, is annexed a ſmall piece, entituled, "An Account of the Trial of the Letter Υ, alias, "Y," the deſign of which was to put gentlemen of learning and leiſure in mind of ſettling the orthography of our language. It is a ſenſible performance, and diſplays, in a pleaſing manner, Mr. Edwards's ſkill in Engliſh criticiſm; a ſtudy, of which he was particularly fond, and in which few have ſhewn a more exact taſte. The two chief things hinted at in the piece are uniformity in ſpelling, where the reaſons from derivation are the ſame; and, preſerving, as much as may be, the marks of etymology (l). In the ſame publication are given fifty of our author's ſonnets, in the ſtyle and manner of Spenſer, twenty-ſeven of which had never before been printed. The reſt, two excepted, had previouſly appeared in Dodſley's and Pearch's collections of poems. Two more original ſonnets, together with an ode, occaſioned by a lady's being burnt with curling-irons, may be ſeen in the ſixth volume of Nichols's Select Collection. The mention of theſe productions brings Mr. Edwards before us under the character of a poet; in which reſpect we can by no means ſpeak ſo highly of him as in his critical capacity. Excepting in the ſingle inſtance juſt ſpecified, we have nothing from his poetical pen beſides ſonnets. Of theſe it is ſaid, that they are "correct, ſimple, not "aiming at points or turns, in the phraſe and ſtructure rather ancient, for the moſt "part of a grave, or even of a melancholy, caſt; formed, in ſhort, upon the model "of the Italians of the good age, and of their imitators among us, Spenſer and Mil-"ton (m)." All this may be true, without conveying any high degree of praiſe; and, indeed our moſt eminent poets have inherited but a ſlender portion of reputation from their ſonnets. After having read thoſe of Mr. Edwards with attention, the chief applauſe we can beſtow upon them is, that they diſcover the traces of an elegant mind and a good heart. The acer Spiritus, the Vis vivida, will be ſought for in them in vain. We acknowledge, at the ſame time, that we are no fond admirers of this ſpecies of poetry. It is liable, we think, to various objections. The conſtruction of the ſtanza, in particular, and the manner in which the rhymes return, (eſpecially if the ancient models be ſtrictly followed,) are very aukward and unpleaſant. Such of our readers as wiſh to ſee what may be advanced againſt and for the ſonnet may have recourſe to two able and acute critics, who have exerted themſelves on the ſubject; Mr. Steevens, in an abſolute condemnation of this mode of writing, and Mr. Malone, in a moderate defence of it, with a more immediate view to the exculpation of Shakſpeare. Mr. Steevens has involved Mr. Edwards in his cenſure (n). Though, in general, we incline to Mr. Steevens's ſide of the queſtion, we are, however, not inſenſible that there are ſeveral beautiful ſonnets in our language. Thoſe of Mrs. Charlotte Smith are peculiarly excellent, and have juſtly given her a high reputation. The few which have been written by Miſs Helen Williams, and Miſs Seward, are very elegant and pleaſing; and there are other ſonnets which might be mentioned with approbation. But we muſt ſtill continue to maintain, that this faſhionable method of compoſition has been carried to a ridiculous exceſs; and that it has loaded our poetical miſcellanies, and our monthly magazines, with an immenſe number of inſipid productions. One thing, however, may be ſaid in its favour as it has lately been conducted; which is, that ſome perſons have dropped the uncouth arrangement of rhymes attached to the old ſonnet, and have compoſed it in three elegiac ſtanzas, ending with a couplet. This is an improvement.

The early part of Mr. Edwards's life was chiefly ſpent in town, and at Pitzhanger in Middleſex. But, in 1739, he purchaſed an eſtate at Turrick, in the pariſh of Elleſborough, in Buckinghamſhire, where he reſided till his deceaſe. This, however, did not prevent his frequent mixture with his literary friends, who were numerous, and reſpectable both in rank and character. It appears that he was acquainted with Richard Owen Cambridge, Eſq. the Honourable Philip Yorke (afterwards ſecond Earl of Hardwicke), Daniel Wray, Eſq. the Honourable Charles Yorke, Iſaac Hawkins Browne, Eſq. the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, Archbiſhop Herring, Lord Willoughby of Parham, Mr. Samuel Richardſon, George Onſlow, Eſq. (now Lord Onſlow), Dr. Heberden, the Right Honourable Arthur Onſlow, Mr. Highmore the painter, and other accompliſhed gentlemen (o). Dr. Akenſide's regard for him has already been diſplayed. Three of his letters to Dr. Birch may be peruſed in the fifty-third volume of the "Gentleman's Magazine (p)." Mrs. Chapone, when Miſs Mulſo, addreſſed an elegant ode to him, which he anſwered by a ſonnet (q).

It is ſo good a one, that we ſhall give it to our readers.

Sweet linnet, who, from off the laurel ſpray
That hangs o'er Spenſer's ever-ſacred tomb,
Pour'ſt out ſuch notes as ſtrike the wood-lark dumb,
And vie with Philomel's enchanting lay;

How

How ſhall my verſe thy melody repay?
If my meek voice could read the age to come,
Like Colin Clout's, thy name ſhould ever bloom
Through future times, unconſcious of decay:

But my frail aid thy merits not require;
Thee Polyhymnia, in the roſeate bowers
Of high Parnaſſus, 'midſt the vocal throng
Shall glad receive, and to her tuneful fire
Preſent, where, crown'd with amarantine flowers,
The raptur'd choir ſhall liſten to thy ſong.

Mr. Edwards's moſt intimate friend ſeems to have been Richard Roderick, Eſq. of Queen's College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, Maſter of Arts, and a Fellow of the Royal Society (r), and of the Society of Antiquaries (s). This gentleman aſſiſted Mr. Edwards in his "Canons of Criticiſm;" and they afterwards correſponded together concerning their favourite bard; the reſult of which was, the "Remarks on Shakſpeare," annexed to the laſt edition of the "Canons (t)." In Mr. Edward's ninety-ninth ſonnet, Mr. Roderick is celebrated as poſſeſſed of very conſiderable poetical talents (u). But that he was no great admirer of ſonnet-writing is evident from the following pleaſant ridicule of this ſpecies of compoſition:

"Thus far with good ſucceſs I think I've ſcribbled,
"And of the twice ſeven lines have clean got o'er ten.
"Courage! another 'll finiſh the firſt triplet.

Mr. Edwards departed this life, on the third of January, 1757, whilſt he was upon a viſit at his friend Mr. Richardſon's, at Parſon's Green, and was buried in the church-yard of Elleſborough, where a monument is erected to his memory, containing the following delineation of his character, compoſed by Daniel Wray, Eſq.

"Under this ſtone are depoſited the remains of "THOMAS EDWARDS, Eſq. of Turrick in this pariſh,
"where he ſpent the laſt ſeventeen years
"of a ſtudious uſeful life.
"He was ſincere and conſtant in the profeſſion and "practice of Chriſtianity, without narrowneſs or ſuperſtition
"ſteadily attached to the cauſe of liberty,
"nor leſs an enemy to licentiouſneſs and faction;
"in his poetry, ſimple, elegant, pathetic
"in his criticiſm, exact, acute, temperate;
"affectionate to his relations, cordial to his friends;
"in the general commerce of life obliging and entertaining.
"He bore a tedious and painful diſtemper with a patience
"which could only ariſe from a habit of virtue and piety;
"and quitted this life with the decent unconcern of one
"whoſe hopes are firmly fixed on a better.
"He died on the 3d day of January, MDCCLVII, aged LVIII;
"and this ſtone is inſcribed to his memory,
"with the trueſt concern and gratitude,
"by his nephews and heirs,

In 1761, was publiſhed a ſmall tract, which had been written by our author, entituled, "Free and candid Thoughts on the Doctrine of Predeſtination (z)." It is ſufficient to ſay of it, that, if it contained nothing new, it diſplayed the liberality of his ſentiments.

Mr. Edwards, who died ſingle, ſurvived four brothers and four ſiſters. His ſonnet on this ſubject, as affording a pleaſing indication of the turn of his mind, ſhall conclude the preſent article.

On a Family Picture.

When penſive on that portraiture I gaze,
Where my four brothers round about me ſtand,
And four fair ſiſters ſmile with graces bland,
The goodly monument of happier days;

And think how ſoon inſatiate death, who preys
On all, has cropp'd the reſt with ruthleſs hand;
While only I ſurvive of all that band,
Which one chaſte bed did to my father raiſe;

It ſeems that, like a column leſt alone,
The tott'ring remnant of ſome ſplendid fane,
Scap'd from the fury of the barbarous Gaul,
And waſting time which has the reſt o'erthrown,
Amidſt our houſe's ruins I remain
Single, unpropp'd, and nodding to my fall (a)].

K.

 [EDWARDS, (GEORGE), an eminent naturaliſt, and eſpecially diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge and delineations of birds, was born on the third of April, 1693, at Stratford, a hamlet belonging to Weſt-Ham in Eſſex, which is a village in the neighbourhood of London. Some of his early years were paſſed under the tuition of a clergyman of the name of Hewit, who was then maſter of a public ſchool at Layton-Stone, a few miles diſtant from the place of young Edwards's birth. Upon quitting this ſchool, he was placed with another miniſter of the eſtabliſhed church at Brentwood; after which, being deſigned by his parents for buſineſs, he was put apprentice to a tradeſman in Fenchurch-ſtreet. He was particularly happy in his maſter, who treated him with great kindneſs and civility; and who, beſides his being a man of a ſtrict regard to religion, had the uncommon qualification of being well ſkilled in the learned languages. About the middle of the term of Mr. Edwards's apprenticeſhip, an event happened, which gave a direction to his future ſtudies. Upon the death of Dr. Nicholas, a perſon of eminence in the phyſical world, and a relation of Edwards's maſter, the Doctor's books, which were very numerous, were removed to our apprentice's apartment. So unexpected an opportunity of acquiring knowledge was not loſt upon him. He availed himſelf of it with eagerneſs, and paſſed all the leiſure of the day, and not unfrequently a conſiderable part of the night, in turning over Dr. Nicholas's collections of Natural Hiſtory, Sculpture, Painting, Aſtronomy, and Antiquities. From this time, Mr. Edwards's expectation of obtaining that opulence which commerce beſtows on her aſſiduous votaries ceaſed. The ſhop and the Exchange were deprived of all their delights; and, on the expiration of his ſervitude, he formed the deſign of travelling into foreign countries, for the purpoſe of improving his taſte and enlarging his mind. His firſt voyage was to Holland, for which he took ſhipping in 1716, and viſited moſt of the principal towns of the United Provinces. After an abſence of a month, he returned to England, and continued two years unemployed in London and its neighbourhood; though not, we may ſuppoſe, without increaſing his acquaintance with Natural Hiſtory. His next voyage was Norway, whither he went at the invitation of a gentleman who was diſpoſed to be his friend, and whoſe nephew was maſter of the veſſel in which Mr. Edwards embarked. An active and philoſophical mind, like his, could not avoid being highly gratified with the new Scenes which were preſented to him by a country that was diverſified with rocks of ſtupendous magnitude, and trees of unfading verdure, and where ſome of the natives had ſcarcely experienced the arts of civilization. The ſun, during his ſtay, ſet only to riſe; and few hours were allotted by him to ſleep. Sometimes he wandered on the banks of the creeks, the haunts of ſea-fowls, and other rude birds, where no articulate voice was heard. At other ſeaſons, he remarked the progreſs of vegetation among the hills; and, whilſt he was employed, he frequently experienced, amongſt the inhabitants of the mountains, that hoſpitality which flouriſhes leſs vigorouſly in more civilized countries.

tries. In his excurſion to Frederickſtadt, he was not diſtant from the cannon of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, who was then engaged in the ſiege of Frederickſhall; before which place that unfortunate monarch loſt his life. By this circumſtance Mr. Edwards was prevented from viſiting Sweden, the Swediſh army being particularly aſſiduous in confining ſtrangers. Notwithſtanding all his precaution, and his ſolicitude to give no offence on either ſide, he was once confined by the Daniſh guard, who ſuppoſed him to be a ſpy employed by the enemy to procure intelligence of their deſigns. However, upon obtaining teſtimonials of his innocence, a releaſe was granted.

In July, 1718, Mr. Edwards embarked for England, and, ſoon after his arrival in London, retired to his native place, where he ſpent the winter. But being deſirous of viſiting France, he went, in 1719, by way of Dieppe to Paris; and, having ſeen the curioſities of that city, took a lodging in a village called Green-court, ſituated in the Great Park of Verſailles. His view in doing this was to enlarge his knowledge of Natural Hiſtory; but, to his no ſmall mortification, there was not, at that time, a living creature in the menagery. As the Court, during the King's minority, did not reſide at Verſailles, the famous collection of animals had been ſo totally neglected, that they were all either dead or diſperſed. Being diſappointed in this reſpect, Mr. Edwards amuſed himſelf with the pompous cavalcades, and expoſitions of reliques, in the ſeveral churches and religious houſes; and he paid particular attention to the labours of the ſculptor and painter in the public buildings. Whilſt he reſided in France, he made two journeys of a hundred miles each. The firſt was to Chalons in Champagne, in the month of May, 1720: the ſecond was on foot, to Orleans and Blois. This was performed in a diſguiſed habit, with the deſign of eſcaping thoſe ſons of rapine who make their depredations on travellers. The ſcheme happened to be peculiarly hazardous: for, an edict had recently been iſſued to ſecure vagrants, in order to tranſport them to America, the Banks of the Miſſiſippi ſtanding in need of population; the conſequence of which was, that our philoſopher narrowly eſcaped a Weſtern voyage.

On Mr. Edwards's return to England, he cloſely purſued his favourite ſtudy of Natural Hiſtory; applying himſelf to the drawing and colouring of ſuch animals as fell under his notice. His earlieſt care was rather to preſerve natural than picturеſque beauty. Birds firſt engaged his particular attention; and, ſome of the beſt pictures of theſe ſubjects being purchaſed by him, he was induced to make a few drawings of his own. Theſe were admired by the curious, who, by paying a good price for them, encouraged our young naturaliſt to proceed with vigour in his labours. James Theobald, Eſq. of Lambeth, a gentleman zealous for the promotion of ſcience, was one of Mr. Edwards's firſt patrons and benefactors. Being thus unexpectedly encouraged, our artiſt increaſed in ſkill and aſſiduity, and procured, by his application to his favourite purſuit, a decent ſubſiſtence and a large acquaintance. Nevertheleſs, he remitted his induſtry in 1731, and, in company with two of his relations, made an excurſion to Holland and Brabant. He was not, however, here uſeleſsly employed; for, he collected ſeveral ſcarce books and prints, and had an opportunity of examining the original pictures of various great maſters, at Antwerp, Bruſſels, Utrecht, and other large cities.

In December, 1733, by the recommendation of Sir Hans Sloane, Bart. Preſident of the College of Phyſicians, Mr. Edwards was choſen their Librarian, and had apartments aſſigned him in the College. This, which was the principal epocha of his private life, fixed him in an office that was particularly agreeable to his taſte and inclination. He had now an opportunity of a conſtant recourſe to a valuable library, filled with ſcarce and curious books on thoſe ſubjects of Natural Hiſtory which he moſt aſſiduouſly ſtudied. By degrees he became one of the moſt eminent ornithologiſts in our own or any other country; and in this reſpect his merit is ſo well known, that it cannot be called in queſtion. It may particularly be obſerved, that he never truſted to others what he could perform himſelf; and that he often found it ſo difficult to give ſatisfaction to his own mind, that he frequently made three or four drawings to delineate the object in its moſt lively character, attitude, and repreſentation (a).

In 1743, Mr. Edwards exhibited to the world an admirable ſpecimen of his labours, in the appearance of the firſt volume of the "Hiſtory of Birds." It was publiſhed in quarto, on royal paper, and contains ſixty-one birds, and two quadrupeds, moſt of which had not either been delineated or deſcribed before. They are engraved on fifty-two plates, from original drawings, exactly coloured, with full and accurate deſcriptions. This volume is dedicated to the Preſident and Fellows of the Royal College of Phyſicians, whoſe favours and aſſiſtance are acknowledged by the author with the utmoſt gratitude. The deſcriptions were publiſhed likewiſe in the French language, for the uſe of foreigners, as is the caſe in the ſucceeding volumes. Mr. Edwards's ſubſcribers having exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations, a ſecond volume of "The Hiſtory of Birds" appeared in 1747, dedicated to Sir Hans Sloane, then Phyſician to his Majeſty, and whoſe merit as a naturaliſt is too univerſally known, both at home and abroad, to require any diſtinct ſpecification in this place. Sir Hans's friendſhip to our author is mentioned in the dedication with all the warmth of a grateful and feeling heart. The volume contains ſixty-one birds and two quadrupeds, engraved on fifty-two copper plates, with deſcriptions. In 1750, was publiſhed the third volume, containing the ſame number of plates, and fifty-nine birds. It was dedicated to the Preſident, Council, and Fellows, of the Royal Society. Our author's fourth volume came from the preſs in 1751, comprehending thirty-ſeven plates, on which are engraved thirty-nine birds, and to which are added ſixteen plates of ſerpents, fiſhes, and inſects. This was the laſt volume which Mr. Edwards at that time intended to publiſh, and he ſeems to have conſidered it as the moſt perfect of his productions in Natural Hiſtory; on which account he dedicated it to the Supreme Being. The dedication was, without doubt, very piouſly deſigned, but the wiſdom of it cannot be commended. Such an aſſumption is too great for any human creature, and the few inſtances of the kind that have occurred in the hiſtory of literature have always been juſtly diſapproved. Perhaps ſome of our readers may wiſh to ſee in what manner our Naturaliſt expreſſed himſelf in this extraordinary dedication. It was as follows:

" To GOD,

" the ONE Eternal! the Incomprehenſible! the Omnipreſent, the Omniſcient, and " Almighty CREATOR of all Things that exiſt! from Orbs immenſurably great, to " the minuteſt points of matter, this ATOM is dedicated and devoted, with all poſſible " Gratitude, Humiliation, Worſhip, and the higheſt Adoration both of Body and " Mind,

" by
" His moſt reſigned,
" low, and humble, Creature,
GEORGE EDWARDS" (b).

(b) Natural Hiſtory of Birds, part the fourth, at the beginning. Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 8—10.

Though, from our author's addreſs to the Deity, it might be ſurmiſed that he meant to have diſcontinued his labours, his mind was two active, and his love of knowledge too ardent, for him to reſt ſatisfied with what he had already done. Accordingly, in 1758, he publiſhed his firſt volume of " Gleanings of Natural Hiſtory," exhibiting ſeventy different birds, fiſhes, inſects, and plants, moſt of which were before non-deſcripts, coloured from nature, on fifty copper plates. This volume was dedicated to the Truſtees of the Britiſh Muſeum. A judicious periodical critic, in ſpeaking of the work, hath paid the following tribute to our author's merit. " But all the writers on Natural " Hiſtory are not chargeable with deficiencies; ſeveral having given deſigns from the " life, and executed them in the moſt accurate manner. Among theſe, Mr. Edwards " deſerves the moſt honourable mention; his deſigns, both in the work before us, and " in his 'Hiſtory of Birds,' being drawn with the greateſt accuracy from nature: and " therefore we are not to wonder at the welcome reception they have met with from all " who have any taſte for juſt delineations, decorated in the moſt beautiful manner. The " principal object is here always drawn in ſome natural and pleaſing attitude, free from " all ſtiffneſs or affectation, and the plate embelliſhed in ſuch a manner as greatly to in- " creaſe the beauty of the object itſelf. Some have, indeed, ſuggeſted, that authors in " this way have ſometimes given too much ſcope to fancy, and, to increaſe the beauty of " their plates, added many touches not to be found in nature. But, with regard to " Mr. Edwards, we have taken ſome pains to ſatisfy ourſelves in this particular, by " comparing many of the figures with the natural objects from which they were " taken, and can with truth aver, that we perceived, in every part, a very exact " reſemblance, both in the drawings and the colouring. Mr. Edwards has, indeed, " made uſe of art in the decorations of his plates, by forming an elegant contraſt between " the colours of the principal objects and thoſe of the ornaments; but, in this reſpect, " he has never departed from nature; ſuch particulars being choſen, whoſe proper " colours form the intended contraſt. Mr. Edwards has alſo contrived to place his ſub- " jects in a variety of pleaſing attitudes, that the eye may not be tired with a diſguſting " ſameneſs of poſition; which at once betrays a poverty of invention and a careleſs in- " ſpection of the original objects themſelves. Another particular which renders Mr. " Edwards's works the more valuable is, that moſt of the ſubjects are ſuch as have " never before been delineated or deſcribed, or that have been inaccurately performed " by others: ſo that they are real acquiſitions to Natural Hiſtory, and increaſe our " knowledge of the numberleſs ſpecies of objects with which the Almighty Creator has " decorated our terreſtrial abode (c)."

(c) Monthly Review, Vol. XVIII. p. 236, 237.

In 1760, our author publiſhed a ſecond volume of the " Gleanings," containing fifty plates and deſcriptions, as well as engravings of one hundred animals and plants. The volume was dedicated to the late Earl of Bute, whoſe ſtudious attachment to Natural Hiſtory, and particularly to Botany, is well known. The third part of the " Glean- " ings," which conſtituted the ſeventh and laſt volume of Mr. Edwards's works, appeared in 1763, and was dedicated to Earl Ferrers, who, when Captain Shirley, had taken, in a French prize, a great number of birds intended for Madame Pompadour.

Theſe

Theſe he communicated to our naturaliſt, who was hence enabled more completely to add to the value of his labours. This part contains eighty-five different ſubjects, deſigned, engraved, and coloured after nature, on fifty-two plates. The three volumes of the "Gleanings" were accompanied with a French tranſlation upon the page oppoſite to the Engliſh. In the former volumes the deſcriptions in French were ſeparately printed.

Thus our author, after a long ſeries of years, the moſt ſtudious application, and a very extenſive correſpondence with every quarter of the world, concluded a work, which, in ſeven volumes, quarto, contains engravings and deſcriptions of more than ſix hundred ſubjects in Natural Hiſtory, not before deſcribed or delineated, and all the productions of his own hand. Some idea of the extreme accuracy and care of our indefatigable artiſt may be formed from the account which he himſelf has given, in the third volume of his "Gleanings," of his ſcrupulous exactneſs, in order to avoid the leaſt miſrepreſentation of any animal, inſect, or plant, which he choſe to delineate. "It often happens," ſays he, "that my figures on the copper plates greatly differ from my original drawings; "for ſometimes the originals have not altogether pleaſed me as to their attitudes or ac- "tions. In ſuch caſes I have made three or four, ſometimes ſix ſketches, or outlines, and "have deliberately conſidered them all, and then fixed upon that, which I judged moſt "free and natural, to be engraven on my plate." "It is not reaſonable," adds he, "to expect, that a work of this nature ſhould be highly laboured and finiſhed in the "colouring part, becauſe it would greatly raiſe the price of it, as colouring work, in "London, when highly finiſhed, comes very dear. The moſt material part is, keeping "as ſtrictly as can be to the variety of colours found in the natural ſubjects; which has "been my principal care: and now, on reviſing all that have been coloured, I think "them much nearer nature than moſt works of the kind that have been publiſhed." Mr. Edwards added to the whole a general index in French and Engliſh, which is now perfectly completed with the Linnæan names, by that great naturaliſt Linnæus himſelf, who frequently honoured him with his friendſhip and correſpondence. A ſtrong teſtimony of the high eſteem which that illuſtrious Profeſſor had for our Engliſh Ornithologiſt will be given below [A]; and we inſert it with the greater pleaſure, as it contains the moſt affectionate recommendations of Dr. Daniel Solander, who was then upon the point of embarking for England, and whoſe memory is ſo juſtly dear not only to the lovers of natural ſcience, but to all who had the pleaſure of his acquaintance (d). Another teſtimony of Linnæus to Mr. Edwards's merit is expreſſed in language ſo remarkably ſtrong that it cannot be omitted. It was written in the year 1764, and is as follows: "Gratulor tibi de tot pulchris tamque infinitis Avibus rariſſimis, quot nullus "unquam detexit, nec unquam detegat, minus unquam tam vivide delineabit, in "quibus nihil deficit niſi cantus: hæ tamen decantabunt nomen, famamque tuam, "tamdiu aves exiſtant, et cum iis homines. Tu per has Seculi noſtri Ornamentum "immortale evaſiſti. Vive diu felix, et me inter ſinceros tuos cultores numera (e)." Upon Mr. Edwards's finiſhing his great work, we find him making the following extraordinary declaration, or rather petition, in which he ſeems afraid that his paſſion for his favourite ſubject of natural hiſtory ſhould get the better of a nobler purſuit, viz. the contemplation of his Maker. "My petition to God (if petitions to God are not "preſumptuous) is, that he would remove from me all deſire of purſuing natural hiſ- "tory or any other ſtudy, and inſpire me with as much knowledge of his divine na" ture as my imperfect ſtate is capable of; that I may conduct myſelf, for the remain" der of my days, in a manner moſt agreeable to his will, which muſt conſequently

" be moſt happy to myſelf. What my condition may be in futurity is known only to " the wiſe Diſpoſer of all things; yet my preſent deſires are (perhaps vain and incon" ſiſtent with the nature of things!) that I may become an intelligent ſpirit, void of
" groſs matter, gravity, and levity, endowed with a voluntary motive-power, either to " pierce infinitely into boundleſs etherial ſpace, or into ſolid bodies; to ſee and know
" how the parts of the great univerſe are connected with each other, and by what " amazing mechaniſm they are put and kept in regular and perpetual motion. But,
" O vain and daring preſumption of thought! I moſt humbly ſubmit my future ex-
" iſtence to the ſupreme will of the One Omnipotent (f)." In the firſt part of this petition there is ſome degree of enthuſiaſm and weakneſs. Why ſhould Mr. Edwards have wiſhed to loſe the deſire of purſuing natural hiſtory, ſince the ſtudy of nature is the ſtudy of the works of God, the rational contemplation of which tends to enlarge our conceptions of the power, the wiſdom, and the goodneſs, of the Divinity, and to promote a ſpirit of devotion? Nor does piety require that any other ſtudy ſhould be laid aſide which conduces to the advancement of knowledge and the welfare of ſociety. The ſecond part of our author's prayer contains a noble ſentiment, though perhaps not judiciouſly expreſſed. The thought of living for ever in the purſuit of ſcience, and the practice of virtue and benevolence, muſt be infinitely pleaſing to an enlightened and well-diſpoſed mind; and I have often reflected that thoſe philoſophers (and it is to be feared they are too numerous) who do not open their underſtandings to the aſſurances of a future ſtate, which Religion adminiſters, have juſt reaſon to be mortified at their being deprived of thoſe dignified proſpects of eternal reſearches into the conſtitution of the univerſe which they might otherwiſe have entertained.

(f) Ibid. p. 13, 14.

Several occaſional papers, upon natural hiſtory, were communicated by Mr. Edwards to the Royal Society, and inſerted in the Philoſophical Tranſactions. They will be found in the forty-eighth, forty-ninth, fiftieth, fifty-firſt, fifty-third, fifty-fifth, and ſixty-firſt, volumes of that moſt valuable collection; and moſt of them have ſince been added, with new engravings, to the Memoirs of his Life and Writings. In a few inſtances, he correſponded with other periodical publications. The prefaces and introductions to many of his volumes contain ſome curious and ingenious eſſays, relative to the object of his principal purſuit; and he hath given, likewiſe, a brief and general idea of drawing and painting in water-colours, with inſtructions for etching on copper-plates, and reflections on the paſſages of birds. Theſe eſſays, in 1770, were ſelected and publiſhed by our author, in one volume, octavo; his deſign in doing which was to accommodate and aſſiſt thoſe perſons, in their reſearches into nature, who were not equal to the expence of his great work.

Seventeen years after Mr. Edwards had been appointed Library-keeper to the College of Phyſicians, he was honoured by the Preſident and Council of the Royal Society with the donation of Sir Godfrey Copley's medal. This was on St. Andrew's Day, 1750; and the honour was conferred upon him in conſideration of his having juſt then completed his "Natural Hiſtory of Birds," though the laſt volume had not yet been publiſhed. His ſenſibility of this diſtinction was ſhewn by him in his cauſing a copy of the medal to be engraved, and placed under the general title in the firſt volume of his hiſtory. On the tenth of November, 1757, he was choſen a fellow of the Royal Society; and he was afterwards elected into the Society of Antiquaries. He had, likewiſe, the honour of being made a member of many of the Academies of Science and Learning in different parts of Europe. In return for ſuch marks of eſtimation from learned bodies, he preſented elegant coloured copies, of all his works, to the Royal College of Phyſicians, the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries, and the Britiſh Muſeum. Having made the ſame preſent to the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, he received from that eminent body a moſt polite and obliging letter of thanks, written by their then Secretary, Monſieur Defouchy.

Our author was honoured with the friendſhip and generous ſupport of ſome of the principal nobility and gentry of this kingdom; and he has mentioned, with peculiar pleaſure, his being patronized by four great men, who were juſtly ranked among the moſt eminent promoters of learning, ſcience, and arts, in the preſent century. Theſe were the late Duke of Richmond, Sir Hans Sloane, Dr. Mead, and Martin Folkes, Eſq. whoſe characters, as drawn up by Mr. Edwards, will form no diſagreeable ſpecimen of his talent for Biographical Sketches [B]. By the deceaſe of theſe perſonages, ſo truly

[B] Of this talent for Biographical Sketches.] The characters are as follow:

" The Duke, noble in his lineage and deſcent " from the royal houſe of theſe kingdoms, but ſtill " more noble and great from the innate magnificence, " generoſity, and goodneſs of his ſoul. Though by " his high offices his time was taken up by the im- " portant affairs of the public, yet his doors were " always open to men of learning, ſcience, and in- " genuity.

" The ſecond was the good Sir Hans Sloane, Bart. " who employed me, for a great number of years, in " drawing truly noble, ſo good, and every way ſo highly accompliſhed, in the ſhort ſpace of three or four years, our naturaliſt was greatly humbled and diſcouraged. He imagined, that, after ſuch a loſs to arts and ſciences in general, and to himſelf in particular, all endeavours to excel in any branch of knowledge would be fruitleſs, for want of eminent men to inſpire the riſing generation; and he thought of diſcontinuing any farther progreſs in natural hiſtory. But the national ſpirit that was diſplayed in the eſtabliſhment of that grand repoſitory of ſcience, the Britiſh Muſeum, revived his paſſion for his favourite purſuits, and was a ſtimulus to others to engage in ſimilar labours; "and, I "hope," ſays he, "theſe ſeeds, ſown by public authority, cheriſhed and protected "by a PRINCE diſtinguiſhed for virtue and learning, will take root, ſpring up, and "yield a plentiful harveſt." Mr. Edwards's hope has been happily accompliſhed: the harveſt truly has been plenteous, and the labourers not a few.

After our author's publication of the laſt volume of his "Gleanings," being arrived at his ſeventieth year, he found that his ſight began to fail him, and that his hand loſt its ſteadineſs. He continued, however, ſome years afterwards in his office of Librarian to the Royal College of Phyſicians; but, finding his infirmities to increaſe, he retired, in 1769, from public employment, to a little houſe which he purchaſed at Plaiſtow; previouſly to which he diſpoſed of all the copies, as well as plates, of his works, to Mr. Robſon, bookſeller, in New Bond-ſtreet. His collection of drawings, amounting to upwards of nine hundred, had before been purchaſed by the Earl of Bute. The converſation of a few ſelect friends, and the peruſal of a few choice books, were Mr. Edwards's amuſement in the evening of his life; and he occaſionally made excurſions to ſome of the principal cities in England; particularly to Briſtol, Bath, Exeter, and Norwich (g).

"drawing miniature figures of animals, &c. after "nature, in water colours, to increaſe his very great "collection of fine drawings by other hands; which "drawings are now all fixed in The Britiſh Muſeum, "for the help and information of thoſe, in future "generations, that may be curious or ſtudious in "natural hiſtory. Sir Hans, in the decline of his "life, left London, and retired to his manor-houſe "at Chelſea, where he reſided about fourteen years "before he died. After his retirement to Chelſea, he "requeſted it as a favour to him (though I embraced "his requeſt as an honour done to myſelf), that I "would viſit him every week, in order to divert "him for an hour or two, with the common news of "the town, and with any thing particular that ſhould "happen amongſt his acquaintance of the Royal "Society, and other ingenious gentlemen, many of "whom I was much converſant with; and I ſeldom "miſſed drinking coffee with him on a Saturday during "the whole time of his retirement at Chelſea. He was "ſo infirm as to be wholly confined to his houſe, ex-"cept ſometimes, though rarely, taking a little air in "his garden in a wheeled chair: and this confine-"ment made him very deſirous to ſee any of his old "acquaintance to amuſe him. During this latter "part of his life, he was frequently petitioned for "charity by ſome decayed branches of eminent men, "late of his acquaintance, who were famous for "their learned works, &c. which petitions he always "received, and conſidered with attention; and, "provided they were not found fraudulent, they "were always anſwered by his charitable donations. "He has often deſired that I would enquire into the "merits of ſuch petitioners; and, if found ſatiſ-"factory, he commiſſioned me to convey his bounty "to the diſtreſſed. The laſt time I ſaw him, I was "greatly ſurpriſed and concerned to find ſo good a "man in the agonies of death; this was on the 10th "day of January, 1753, at four o'clock in the after-"noon. He died on the 11th, at four in the morning. "I continued with him later than any of his relations, "but was obliged to retire, his laſt agonies being "beyond what I could bear; though, under his pain "and weakneſs of body, he ſeemed to retain a great "firmneſs of mind and reſignation to the will of "God.

"The third of my patrons was the Great Richard "Mead, M. D. He was certainly magnanimous "beyond the common meaſure, and deſerved the title "of Great in as extenſive a ſenſe as any man in his "ſtation could do. He, as well as Sir Hans Sloane, "died in the higheſt ſtations of phyſic they could "arrive at, viz. Phyſicians in ordinary to the King. "Dr. Mead, indeed, never was at the head of the "College of Phyſicians of London; but it was be-"cauſe he always abſolutely declined it; for, he had "been elected into that honourable ſtation, but never "could be perſuaded to accept of it. His perſonal "ſervice, his ample fortune, his houſe, and every "thing in his power, always contributed, in the "moſt extenſive manner, to the promotion of learn-"ing, ſcience, arts, mechanics, and, in ſhort, "every thing that tended to the public benefit and "honour of his country, or was of uſe to particular "members of the community he lived in. In ſhort, "his generoſity was ſo diffuſive, that he may be juſtly "deemed a benefactor to the whole community, "whilſt, inſtead of hoarding up that great wealth his "practice gained to raiſe a vaſt eſtate, as he might "eaſily have done, his public ſpirit was unconfined, "and he was contented to leave behind him a moderate "fortune only. The worthy Dr. Aſkew, from a "laudable veneration for the memory and public "character of ſo great a patron of learning, &c. "cauſed a fine marble buſt of him to be made by one "of the moſt eminent ſculptors of the preſent age, "which is placed in the College of Phyſicians, "London. And, on this occaſion, I cannot help in-"forming ſucceeding generations, that they may ſee "the real features of Dr. Mead in this ſaid buſt; for I, "who was as well acquainted with his face as any one "living, do pronounce this buſt of him to be ſo like, "that, as often as I ſee it, my mind is filled with "the ſtrongeſt idea of the original.

"Martin Folkes, Eſq. the laſt of my deceaſed "principal patrons, was a friend and intimate ac-"quantance of the other three. He had made the "grand tour of Europe, not in the younger part of "his life, but after his marriage. He travelled with "part of his family and ſervants, at a proper age to "make juſt obſervations, and gather all the com-"mendable parts of the learning, cuſtoms, and man-"ners, of the countries through which he paſſed, in "order to refine and poliſh thoſe of his own. He "travelled not in haſte, as is the general cuſtom; but "proceeded ſlowly, and ſpent what time was neceſ-"ſary to inform himſelf of all that was worth notice: "and, indeed, he ſeemed to have attained to univerſal "knowledge; for, in the many opportunities I have "had of being in his company, almoſt every part of "ſcience has happened to be the ſubject of diſcourſe. "all of which he handled as an adept in each. He "was a man of great politeneſs in his manners, free "from all pedantry and pride, and, in every reſpect "the real unaffected fine gentleman (2)."

(2) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 16—19. Note. Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 550, 551. Note.

Old as our author now was, he could not wholly abſtain from his beloved employments: he delineated at Plaiſtow ſome ſcarce animals, and particularly the Siyah Ghuſh, or black Ear, a ſpecies of the Cat-kind; an engraving of which, from his drawing, may be found in Dr. Gregory Sharpe's edition of the "Syntagma Diſſertationum" of Dr. Thomas Hyde. Our naturaliſt made alſo a drawing and engraving of the Argus or Luen, one of the largeſt ſpecies of pheaſant, a native of the North of China. This was done from a preſerved bird, that had been tranſmitted to Dr. Fothergill. Another of his drawings was of the ſnake-killer of the Indies, from the living bird belonging to Captain Raymond, at Valentines in Eſſex. Engravings of theſe three animals, and of the narrow-beaked crocodile of the Ganges, and the frog-fiſh of Surinam, are given in the Addenda to the Memoirs of Mr. Edwards's Life. We may add, that, during his retirement at Plaiſtow, he made drawings of the Keſtril, a ſpecies of hawk found in hollow trees and ruined buildings in England; which bird the reader will find deſcribed, in the "Britiſh Zoology," by the ingenious Mr. Pennant, with whom our author had a long and uninterrupted friendſhip and correſpondence. Mr. Edwards left an edition of Willoughby's Ornithology, with manuſcript notes, and many curious obſervations; in which he corrected the miſtakes, and ſupplied the omiſſions, of former writers. It is ſaid that they were ſoon intended to be given to the public; but we do not recollect that they have ever made their appearance. Some time before his deceaſe, he diſpoſed of a curious copy of "Cateſby's Carolina" to Mr. Bartlet, of Lamb's-Conduit-ſtreet. The plates were highly coloured by himſelf, and he often expreſſed his opinion that they were equal to the author's original work.

Mr. Edwards's latter years were embittered by the alarming depredations of a cancer, which baffled all the efforts of medical ſkill, and deprived him of the ſight of one of his eyes. He ſuffered much, likewiſe, from the ſtone, a complaint to which he had been ſubject at different periods of his life. It has, nevertheleſs, been remarked, that in the ſevereſt paroxyſms of miſery he was ſcarcely known to utter a ſingle complaint. Having completed his eightieth year, and become emaciated with age and ſickneſs, he died on the twenty-third of July, 1773, deſervedly lamented by a numerous acquaintance. To two ſiſters, whom he left behind him, he bequeathed the fortune which he had acquired by an aſſiduous application to his favourite purſuits. They did not long ſurvive him, and, dying within a few hours of each other, were buried together. Mr. Edwards's remains were interred in the church-yard of Weſt-Ham, his native pariſh, where his executors have erected a ſtone, with a plain inſcription, to perpetuate his ſkill as an artiſt, and his knowledge as a zoologiſt. With regard to his perſon, he was of a middle ſtature, rather inclining to corpulence: the turn of his mind was liberal and chearful. The benevolence of his temper was experienced by all his acquaintance, and his poor neighbours frequently partook of his bounty. From the diffidence and humility which were always apparent in his behaviour, he did not ſeem to be calculated for ſhining in general converſation; but, to perſons who had a taſte for ſtudies congenial to his own, he was a moſt entertaining as well as communicative companion (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 22—26.

Linnæus's encomiums on Mr. Edwards were not confined to his life, but extended to him after his deceaſe. In a letter written to Mr. Robſon, in the year 1755, he ſays, "Edwardi aves certe primum locum tenent, inter omnia opera, quæ in ornithologiâ "prodiere, in quibus dubius hæreo, utrum magis extollam auctoris infinitam diligen- "tiam in conquirendo rariſſimam copiam avium novarum ex toto orbe, et acutiſſimè "deſcribendo eorum ſtructuram; an figuras dando vivas et accuratiſſimas, et quales "mundus antea non vidit (i)." How much Mr. Edwards's works continue to be held in eſtimation is apparent from the high price at which they are commonly ſold. His proper and diſtinct character is, that he far excelled all the Engliſh Ornithologiſts who had gone before him. The immenſe acceſſions which, ſince the year 1763, have been made to natural knowledge, and the higher degree of taſte and elegance to which the art of engraving has been carried, will give to ſome productions now in preparation an eminence and a reputation ſuperior to what our author has attained. But that he ſhould be exceeded by thoſe who came after him will be no diminution to his juſt fame, or prevent his memory from being handed down to poſterity with honour and applauſe.

(i) Catalogue of the birds, beaſts, fiſhes, inſects, plants, &c. contained in Edwards's Natural Hiſtory, with their Latin names by Sir C. Linnæus, printed at the end of the Memoirs of Mr. Edwards's Life.

To the collectors of the portraits of literary men it may not be amiſs to mention, that a print of Mr. Edwards, engraved by J. S. Miller in 1754, after a painting by Dandridge, is a moſt ſtriking likeneſs (k)]. K.

 [EDWARDS (THOMAS)*, a learned divine, of the Church of England, in the preſent century, was born at Coventry, on the tenth of Auguſt, old ſtyle, 1729, and was the ſon of the Reverend Thomas Edwards, M. A. Vicar of St. Michael's in that city, and of Katharine his wife. His grammatical education he received partly under the tuition of Edward Jackſon, D. D. Maſter of the Free Grammar-ſchool, in Coventry, but principally under the care of his own father; and ſuch was his eagerneſs for the acquiſition of knowledge, that he ſeldom engaged in the diverſions common to boys. In 1747, at the age of eighteen, he was matriculated at the Univerſity of Cambridge, and entered of Clare Hall, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1750, and of Maſter in 1754. He was, likewiſe, a Fellow of his College. In the younger part of his life, he was a ſelf-taught muſician, and became no mean performer on the ſpinnet and the baſe-viol: but, finding that this amuſement encroached too much upon his ſtudies, he entirely relinquiſhed it. On the twenty-ſecond of September, 1751, he was ordained Deacon, and, on the twenty-third of September, 1753, he was ordained Prieſt, both which Orders he received from the hands of Dr. Frederick Cornwallis, at that time Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry. In the Spring of 1755, when Mr. Edwards was not yet twenty-ſix years of age, he gave a ſtriking proof of the diligence with which he had applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the learned languages, and the acquiſition of ſacred literature. This was his publication of "A new Engliſh Tranſlation of the "Pſalms from the original Hebrew, reduced to Metre by the late Biſhop Hare; with "Notes, critical and explanatory, Illuſtrations of many Paſſages, drawn from the Claſſics, "and a preliminary Diſſertation, in which the Truth and Certainty of that learned Pre-"late's happy diſcovery is ſtated, and proved at large." Octavo. Dr. Hare's diſcovery will more properly occur in that Biſhop's article. It may be ſufficient here to obſerve, that it was Mr. Edwards's deſign to make the Prelate's ſyſtem of Hebrew metre better known, and to prove, that, by a judicious application of it, great light might be thrown upon the poetical parts of the Hebrew Scriptures. Our author is of opinion, that Dr. Hare's Hypotheſis was rejected by many perſons, partly from an over-haſty determination, and partly from too ſcrupulous a veneration for the Hebrew text. That our readers may be able, in ſome little degree, to judge how far Mr. Edwards ſucceeded in his tranſlation of the Pſalms, we ſhall ſubjoin two ſhort ſpecimens of it [A]; which, we think, will give ſatisfaction, both from the eaſe of the language and the juſtneſs of the verſion. The notes, which comprehend more than one third of the book, chiefly contain emendations of the Hebrew text, pointed out by the metre, and illuſtrations of ſome paſſages, drawn from the claſſics, together with an explanation of the moſt difficult places. Conſiderable uſe is made by our author of Hare and Mudge, but with no ſervile adherence to their authority (a). Mr. Edwards's next publication was only a ſingle Sermon, which he had preached at St. Michael's in Coventry, on the ſixth of February, 1756. On the ſecond of May, 1758, he was nominated, by the Corporation of Coventry, Maſter of the Free Grammar-ſchool, and preſented to the Rectory of St. John the Baptiſt, in that city [B]. This promotion was followed by his

[B] And preſented to the Rectory of St. John the Baptiſt, in that City.] By an act paſſed in the beginning of the year 1734, entituled, "An Act for the "making the Church of Bablack, in the City of "Coventry, a Pariſh Church, and for appointing a "Diſtrict, or Pariſh, thereto, and for enabling the "Maſter and Uſher of the Grammar Schole in the "ſaid City, to be Rector and Lecturer of the ſaid "Pariſh Church," it was enacted that the Church of Bablack, otherwiſe Bablake, in the City of Coventry, ſhall, from and after the twenty-third day of June, 1734, be, and ever be deemed, and taken to be, a pariſh-church, by the name of "The Church of St. "John Baptiſt, in the City of Coventry:——that "there ſhall be a Rector and Lecturer in the ſaid "Church:——that the Mayor, Bayliffs, and Com-"monalty, of the City of Coventry, ſhall be Patrons "of the ſaid Pariſh-Church, and Owner of the "Advowſon thereof:——that the Perſon at any "Time appointed, by the ſaid Mayor, Bayliffs, and "Commonalty, Maſter of the Free Grammar Schole "in the ſaid City, ſhall be a Perſon in the Holy "Order of Prieſthood, and ſhall be Rector of the "ſaid Pariſh, and Pariſh of St. John the Baptiſt, and "ſhall, upon ſuch Nomination, receive, from the ſaid "Mayor, his marriage, which took place on the twenty-ſeventh of November, in the ſame year. The lady he married was Ann Parrott, daughter of Stonyer Parrott, Eſq. of Hawkeſbury, in the pariſh of Foleſhill, in the county of Warwick, by whom he had one ſon, the preſent Dr. Edwards of Cambridge. Early in 1759, Mr. Edwards gave to the public one of his principal works, and, indeed, in our opinion, the moſt uſeful of all his theological productions. This was "The Doctrine of irreſiſtible Grace proved to have "no Foundation in the Writings of the New Teſtament." In treating upon this ſubject, our author purſued the plan, which had been adopted by Clarke on the Trinity, and Hoadly on the Sacrament, of arranging every text of Scripture that was ſuppoſed to relate to the point in queſtion. In the firſt chapter of his work, Mr. Edwards lays before his readers the ſeveral Scriptural notions of the word Grace, and hence is led to conſider all the paſſages of the New Teſtament in which χαρις occurs. In the ſecond chapter thoſe texts are examined, in which mention is made of the Holy Ghoſt, the Spirit, and the Spirit of God. The deſign of the third chapter is to ſhew, that as the Calviniſtical Tenet of irreſiſtible Grace does not receive the leaſt countenance from, or is ſo much as hinted at in, any of the texts produced under the two preceding heads, ſo neither is it poſſible that it ſhould be countenanced by theſe or any other paſſages in the ſacred writings, ſince it would make them contradict and be inconſiſtent with themſelves. In the fourth chapter, our author conſiders the principal of thoſe paſſages in the New Teſtament, which are uſually alleged as irrefragable proofs of the above doctrine, and endeavours to refute the arguments deduced from them, by ſhewing them, when rightly interpreted, to be quite foreign to the purpoſe for which they are quoted. The buſineſs of the laſt chapter is briefly to point out in what manner, and upon what perſons, it ſeems moſt probable for the Spirit of God now to act. It is Mr. Edwards's opinion, that, though the ſupernatural aſſiſtance, in common to Chriſtians of all ages, is not to be collected from all thoſe texts in the New Teſtament which are uſually brought as proofs of the truth and reality of it, yet that there are undoubtedly ſeveral paſſages, which ſufficiently ſhew, that the operations of the Holy Spirit are not to be entirely limited and confined to the extraordinary and miraculous gifts and endowments peculiar to the apoſtolic age, but, on the contrary, that it will, in all ſucceeding times, be communicated, in a peculiar manner, to all thoſe who may ſtand in need of it, in order to the diſcharge of their duty. In maintaining this ſentiment, he quotes, with approbation, the judgment of Dr. John Taylor, who ſays, "Although, when the Holy Ghoſt, or the gifts of the Spirit, are mentioned in the "epiſtolary part of the New Teſtament, moſt commonly thereby the extraordinary "effuſion and miraculous gifts peculiar to the apoſtolic age are intended, yet, I "make no doubt, the communication and influence of the Spirit of God in all ages to "aſſiſt our ſincere endeavours after wiſdom, and the habits of virtue, is a bleſſing "ſpoken of and promiſed in the Goſpel." How far our author has ſucceeded, in explaining the general manner in which the Spirit acts and operates upon man, we do not take upon us to determine. Independently of this conſideration, Mr. Edwards's book is a book of real importance in the controverſy between the Calviniſts and the Arminians; and he has ſhewn, in the courſe of it, that he was well acquainted with the original languages of the Old and New Teſtament; that he was poſſeſſed of very conſiderable abilities as a critic; and that he was a ſincere and candid enquirer after truth (b). Our author's next publication, which appeared in 1762, was entituled, "Prolegomena in Libros Veteris Teſtamenti Poeticos; ſive Diſſertatio, in qua Viri "eruditiſſimi Franciſci Harii nuper Epiſcopi Ciceſtrienſis de antiqua Hebræorum "poeſi Hypotheſin Ratione et Veritate niti, fuſe oſtenditur, atque ad objecta quædam "reſpondetur.———Subjicitur Metricæ Lowthianæ Confutatio, cum Indicibus neceſſariis." Octavo. This attack upon Dr. Lowth's "Metricæ Harianæ brevis Confutatio," which had been annexed to the firſt edition of his admirable "Prælectiones "de ſacra Poeſi Hebræorum," did not paſs unnoticed by that gentleman. In the ſecond edition of his "Prælectiones," he added a note, in which he ſtrenuouſly maintained his own opinion, in oppoſition to that of Mr. Edwards (c). In reply to this note, our author publiſhed, in 1765, "Epiſtola ad doctiſſimum Robertum Lowthium,

" S. T. P. In qua nonnulla, quæ ad nuperæ ſuæ de ſacra Hebræorum Poeſi Præ-
" lectionum Editionis Calcem habet, expenduntur." It is with regret we mention, that, Mr. Edwards, on the preſent occaſion, indulged himſelf in ſome ſeverity of language, which the ſubject did not merit, and which ought not to have been uſed towards ſuch an antagoniſt as Dr. Lowth. The Doctor thought the " Epiſtola" of conſequence enough to deſerve a reply; and, therefore, he printed, in 1766, " A larger Confuta-
" tion of Biſhop Hare's Syſtem of Hebrew Metre: in a Letter to the Reverend Dr. Ed-
" wards; in Anſwer to his Latin Epiſtle." Octavo. Here the controverſy ended; and, having paid a conſiderable attention to it during the time in which it was carried on, we may be permitted to ſay, that, in concurrence with the general opinion of the learned world, we gave the preference to Dr. Lowth's arguments.

In 1766, Mr. Edwards was admitted to the degree of Doctor in Divinity (d); not long after which (early in 1767) he publiſhed " Two Diſſertations: the firſt, on the " Abſurdity and Injuſtice of religious Bigotry and Perſecution; their utter Contrariety
" to the Temper and Conduct of Chriſt and his Apoſtles; and their miſchievous and
" fatal conſequences: the ſecond, on the principal Qualifications and Canons, neceſſary
" for the right and accurate Interpretation of the New Teſtament." Octavo. Theſe diſſertations reflect juſt credit on our author's reputation. The firſt of them ſhews him to have been poſſeſſed of an enlarged and liberal mind; and the ſecond contains a variety of judicious and uſeful directions to theological ſtudents, and to ſuch perſons in general as are deſirous of attaining an exact and critical knowledge of the evangelical and apoſtolical writings (e). Dr. Edwards's next publication was in Latin, being
" Duæ Diſſertationes: in quarum Priore probatur, variantes Lectiones et Menda, quæ
" in ſacram Scripturam irrepſerunt, non labefactare ejus Auctoritatem in Rebus, quæ
" ad Fidem et Mores pertinent: in poſteriore vero, Prædeſtinationem Paulinam ad
" Gentilium Vocationem totam ſpectare." Octavo. It is ſufficient to ſay of theſe diſſertations, which appeared in 1768, that they clearly and fully prove the points in queſtion (f).

In 1770, Dr. Edwards was preſented by the Crown to the valuable vicarage of Nuneaton in Warwickſhire; which preferment he is underſtood to have obtained through the intereſt of the Corporation of Coventry, and ſome private friends, with the Earl of Hertford, Lord Lieutenant of the County. Our author, in 1773, publiſhed a Sermon, entituled, " The indiſpenſable Duty of contending for the Faith which was once de" livered to the Saints." It had been preached before the Univerſity of Cambridge, on the twenty-ninth of June, 1766, being Commencement Sunday. It is, ſay the Monthly Reviewers, " a ſhort, but excellent diſcourſe, worthy of Dr. Edwards, whoſe
" learned and valuable writings we have had frequent reaſon to mention with appro" bation (g)." In 1779, the Doctor reſigned the Maſterſhip of the Free Grammar-ſchool of Coventry, and the Rectory of St. John's, and retired to Nuneaton, where he reſided during the remainder of his life. His laſt publication was given to the world in the ſame year. The title of it is, " Selecta quædam Theocriti Idyllia. Recenſuit,
" Variorum Notas adjecit, ſuaſque Animadverſiones, partim Latine, partim Anglice,
" ſcriptas immiſcuit, Thomas Edwards, S. T. P." Octavo. This work reflects honour on the accuracy and extent of our author's claſſical literature. Though the original text of what is ſelected from Theocritus conſiſts only of about three hundred and fifty lines, the notes are extended through upwards of two hundred and fifty pages, beſides more than twenty pages, conſiſting of Addenda, Corrigenda, Collationes, &c. Dr. Edwards's reaſon for his being ſo minute and particular in many of his animadverſions, was, that he might give every poſſible kind of aſſiſtance to young perſons, for whom the book was principally intended. Having written the notes ſometimes in Latin, and ſometimes in Engliſh, as chance or inclination directed, he thought proper to publiſh them in that promiſcuous form. It would, however, undoubtedly have been preferable uniformly to have compoſed them in the Latin language. There are two appendiculæ at the end of the volume; one containing the editor's reaſons for not prefixing the accentual marks to his own and Mr. Warton's notes; and the other affording hints of a new method which the Doctor had diſcovered, of ſcanning Greek and Latin hexameters, the uſual mode of doing it, being, as he thought, erroneous. A fuller explanation of his ſyſtem was intended to be given by him in a work which he had in contemplation, deſigned to be entituled, " Miſcellanea Critica (h)," but which was not carried into execution. As we here cloſe our account of his writings, it may be added, that he had made collections for an edition of Quintus Curtius.

In May, 1784, Dr. Edwards loſt his wife, a lady of diſtinguiſhed good ſenſe, and of the moſt engaging manners.

The following character of her, drawn up by the Doctor himſelf, and univerſally allowed to be a juſt one, was inſerted in the Coventry Mercury.

" Saturday, 22d of May, 1784, died, after a lingering and moſt painful illneſs,
" borne with the utmoſt patience and reſignation, Mrs. Edwards, wife of the Reverend " Dr. Edwards, and daughter of the late Stonyer Parrot, of Hawkſbury, near this " city, Eſq.——a lady of an excellent underſtanding; which ſhe had diligently im" proved by much reading.—As ſhe was, from examination and conviction, a ſincere

" believer in the Chriſtian ſyſtem; ſo her benevolence to mankind was unconfined and " univerſal:—Her chief ſtudy was to do good; and, as far as ſhe had it in her
" power, to make others happy:—Her ſweet and amiable diſpoſition, her ſenſible
" and agreeable converſation, her mild and gentle manners, endeared her to all who " knew her:—She was an affectionate wife, a tender mother, a kind miſtreſs, and a
" faithful friend." The Doctor, who had paſſed his life in his ſtudy, and was totally unacquainted with domeſtic concerns, and, indeed with worldly affairs of every kind, never enjoyed himſelf after this event. What aggravated his diſtreſs was, that, previouſly to Mrs. Edwards's death, he had been afflicted with a ſtroke of the palſy, from which, however, he ſo far recovered as to be capable of diſcharging part of his parochial duties. But, within a few months after her deceaſe, he had a ſecond ſtroke, for which he was adviſed to go to Bath, but received no benefit from his journey. He departed this life at Nuneaton, on the thirtieth of June, 1785, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age; and, on the ſeventh of July was interred in the church-yard belonging to the pariſh of Foleſhill, in the ſame grave with his wife. An inſcription on a mural marble, contains nothing of moment excepting the dates already ſpecified.

In his temper, Dr. Edwards was ſometimes ſubject to ſtarts of anger; but otherwiſe he was remarkably mild, benevolent, and humane. His generoſity was great and extenſive; and his dealings with others were conducted on the principles of the moſt rigid honeſty and integrity. Such were his aſſiduity and ability in the inſtruction of youth, and ſo conſcientious his diſcharge of his parochial Duties, that no praiſe can exceed his merits. He was fond of retirement, and went ſeldom from his place of abode; on which account, though he occaſionally correſponded with many of the literati, he was not in the habits of much intimacy with any. The perſon with whom he had moſt converſed was the late excellent and learned Biſhop of Carliſle, Dr. Edmund Law. Their ſentiments were congenial, and their purſuits ſimilar; being principally devoted to the proſecution and promotion of ſacred literature. Our author's only ſon, the Reverend Dr. Thomas Edwards of Cambridge, beſides his general learning, is eminent for his critical ſkill in the Greek tongue; and that he is a gentleman of very liberal ſentiments has been evinced by his publications.] K.

[A] From the ancient family of Egerton in that county.] Which family, according to (1) Camden, is deſcended from Robert Fitzhugh, Baron of Malpas, in the reign of William the Conqueror (2). The moſt ancient record in the kingdom is that ſurvey made by William the Conqueror which is kept in the Chapter Houſe of Weſtminſter-Abbey, (now called the Record Office,) and, is entitled, " Liber Judiciarius," or " Doomſday Book." It contains an account of the lands, lordſhips, &c. within the ſeveral Counties of England, except thoſe of Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, Northumberland, and Durham; and was begun in (3) the fourteenth year of the reign of William the Conqueror, as the Red Book in the Exchequer manifeſts, but was not finiſhed till the twentieth of the ſame King, as the book itſelf declares.

By this ſurvey it appears, that Robert, ſon of Hugh, Baron of Malpas, held in Ceſtreſcire, and other parts, the manors of Bedesfield, Burwardeſtone, Hurdingberry, Depenbache, (now called Malpas,) Tilleſtone, Criſtletone, Calmundelei, Edghe, Hanton, Lawechdone or Laborchedone, Dochington, Catelea, Broſſe, Oretone, Cuntilone, Schochliche, Tuſigeham, Bicheley, Buertone, Burwardeſhly, Rauichell, Creuhalle, Tidulſtone or Tidniſtone, Buiſtane, Boleberrie, Tevertone, Spariſtowe, Penretane, Fentone, Sudtone, Buteloge, and Cochneeche or Croverche or Coenege (4).

But, the ſaid Robert dying (5) without male iſſue, the Barony of Malpas, with the ſeveral Lordſhips, Manors, and Eſtates, devolved on his only daughter and heir, Lætitia, married to Richard de Belward (6), and thereby came into this famous and hnigktly family, as Camden ſtyles it, of which was John Le Belward de Malpas in the reign of William Rufus. His ſon and heir, named William, by Sir (7) William Dugdale, but Richard by Mr. Erdeſwicke (8), according to other good authorities, was married to Beatrix, daughter of Hugh Keveliock, Earl of Cheſter, and ſiſter of Ranulph, Earl of Cheſter. He was, in right of his mother, Baron of Malpas; though it is ſaid by ſome, that he had only half the Barony; but, it is agreed by Sir William Dugdale (9), and other of our antiquaries, that he left iſſue three ſons, David, Robert, the direct anceſtor of the ſeveral families of Cholmondeley, and Richard.

David, eldeſt ſon of William, ſtyled Dan David de Malpas, and ſometimes Le Clerc, married Margaret, daughter and heir of Ralph ap Eynion, (a perſon of great note, and large poſſeſſions in Wales and Cheſhire,) by Beatrix, daughter of Ranulph (10), the ſecond of that name, Earl of Cheſter, whereby he became poſſeſſed of the entire Barony of Malpas, one half by deſcent, and the other in right of his wife. He was alſo Juſtice of Cheſter (11), and Sheriff of the County of Cheſter in 36 Hen. 3. and held three knights fees in the ſame reign.

His ſons were: 1. William, Baron of Malpas, who left no legitimate iſſue. 2. Philip, High Sheriff of Cheſhire, temp. Edward I. who poſſeſſing the Manor of Egerton, in the County of Cheſter, took, according to the cuſtom of that age, the ſurname of Egerton from the place of his reſidence (12).

(13) From him, in lineal deſcent, was Sir John Egerton, of Egerton, Knight, who, fighting valiantly for the Houſe of Lancaſter, under the Lord Audley, General about the year 1540. In 1556 he was admitted a Commoner of Brazen Noſe College, in Oxford, where he continued about three years; and, having laid a good foundation of claſſical and logical learning, he removed thence to Lincoln's Inn, and applied himſelf with ſuch ſucceſs to the ſtudy of the law, that he ſoon became a noted counſellor (c) [B]. The ſuperior abilities he diſplayed in the line of his profeſſion, and his diſtinguiſhed eminence at the bar, did not eſcape the notice of Queen Elizabeth, whoſe diſcerning eye fingled out a Drake, a Raleigh, a Sidney, and a Vane, and the ableſt men in every department of Government, to be the inſtruments of her happy and auſpicious reign. On the 28th of June, 1581, ſhe appointed him her Solicitor General (d); and, the year after, he was choſen Lent Reader of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, an office which was conferred on none but perſons diſtinguiſhed by ſuperior learning and abilities. He was made alſo one of the governors of that ſociety, and continued ſo for twelve years ſucceſſively (e). [B] Became a noted counſellor.] There is a tradition that one of the firſt public occaſions which created an opinion of Lord Chancellor Egerton's ſhrewdneſs and ability in his profeſſion was ſhortly after he removed to Lincoln's Inn. He happened to be in Court when a cauſe was trying, in which it appeared, that three graziers had veſted a joint depoſit of a ſum of money in the cuſtody of a woman, who lived in Smithfield, upon condition, that ſhe was to account for it upon their coming to demand it together. One of the graziers, by perſuading her that he was commiſſioned to receive the money by his two partners, who were bargaining for ſome oxen, and only waiting for the money to conclude the purchaſe, prevailed upon her to entruſt him with it; and he immediately abſconded. The two other partners began a ſuit againſt the woman to recover their money. The cauſe was brought on, and nothing now appeared to remain, but that a verdict ſhould be given in favour of the plaintiffs: when Mr. Egerton ſtepped forward, and begged leave to ſpeak as "Amicus Curiæ."—Upon obtaining permiſſion, he took care to eſtabliſh the conditions upon which the defendant was entruſted with the money. Theſe being readily allowed to be ſuch as above ſtated; "Then," ſaid he, "the defendant is ready to comply with the agreement. The plaintiffs only may deſervedly be charged with attempting its violation. Two of them have brought a ſuit againſt this woman to oblige her to pay them a ſum of money, which, by the agreement, ſhe was to pay to thoſe two, and to the remaining partner jointly, coming together to demand it—where is he? why does not he appear? why do not the plaintiffs bring their partner along with them? When they do this, and fullfill the agreement on their part, ſhe is ready to come up to the full extent of it on hers: till then, I apprehend that ſhe is by law to remain in quiet poſſeſſion." This turned the cauſe, and a verdict was found for the defendant.

[C] Acknowledged, by Sir Robert Cecil, as a favour done perſonally to himſelf.]

'Sir,

'I have underſtood by my couſin Bacon what a 'friendly and kind offer you have made him, the 'better to arm him with your obſervations (for the 'exerciſe of ſolicitorſhip) which otherwiſe may be got 'with time. For, the greateſt ſufficiency of wit and 'learning may yet be to ſeek of things falling into 'practice without ſome light given, which, as he doth 'exceedingly pleaſe himſelf to receive of a man of 'your gravity; ſo do I thank you for it, as much as 'if it had been done to myſelf. And this I dare aſſure you, that I have no kinſman living (my brother 'excepted) whom I hold ſo dear. Neither do I 'think, that you, or any other, can confer any good 'turn upon any gentleman (though I ſay it to you in 'private) likelier for his own worth to deſerve it. 'The place by the ſuddenneſs of the remove was procraſtinated; but your help in the mean time (in this 'courſe offered him) will ſerve to ſo good a purpoſe, 'as I am not ſorry he hath this vacation of ſome few 'days to inform himſelf at better leiſure of thoſe 'things, which at the very firſt he ſhould have uſe of. 'Sir, I would write more, if I ſpake not in a manner 'for myſelf: for ſo, I aſſure you, in meaſure of love 'and affection, he ſtandeth unto me. But, ſeeing I 'ſpeak to a wiſe man, to whom a word is more than 'a ſentence, I will leave all other circumſtances, and 'will ſtudy to make you know how great an obligation any man's kindneſs to him doth throw on me; 'and ſo I bid you farewell.

'From the Strand, this 27th of March, 1794.

'Your aſſured loving friend,

'RO. CECIL.'

The particular friendſhip and kindneſs ſhewn by the Chancellor Egerton to Bacon on all occaſions were repeatedly acknowledged by his brother Anthony Bacon, by many acts and expreſſions of gratitude, as appears from many of his letters (18).

[D] With the title of Lord Keeper.] Mr. Reynolds informs the Earl of Eſſex, by letter, that 'The 'Maſter of the Rolls had changed his ſtyle, and was 'made Lord Keeper, only by her Majeſty's gracious 'favour, and by her own choice, without any competitor or mediator. I think no man ever came to 'this dignity with more applauſe than this worthy 'gentleman (19).' Mr. Anthony Bacon likewiſe, by letter, informs Dr. Hawkins, at Venice, 'That the 'late Lord Keeper, Sir John Puckering, was dead of 'an apoplexy very ſuddenly, into whoſe place, with 'an

of the Queen, without any mediator or competitor, and even againſt the intereſt of the Prime Miniſter and his ſon; and, at the ſame time, he was ſworn of her Majeſty's Privy Council: of whoſe integrity and abilities, according to Camden (k), all men were full of expectation and belief, which he completely anſwered. He was permitted to hold the Maſterſhip of the Rolls till May 18, 1603, when James I. conferred it on Edward Bruce, afterwards Baron of Kinloſs (l).

The integrity and abilities of the Lord Keeper conciliated the favour and confidence of his royal miſtreſs, inſomuch that ſhe employed him in her deepeſt councils, and commiſſioned him on the moſt weighty occaſions and emergencies of ſtate (m). In 1598, he was in commiſſion for treating with the Dutch, and, jointly with the Lord Buckhurſt, Cecil, and others, ſigned a new treaty with their Embaſſadors in London. Anxious as the States were to proſecute the war with Spain, and being in ſome meaſure deſerted by Henry the Fourth, King of France, they were glad to preſerve Queen Elizabeth's alliance by ſubmitting to any terms which ſhe pleaſed to require of them. The debt which they owed her was now ſettled at eight hundred thouſand pounds. Of this ſum they agreed to pay, during the war, thirty thouſand pounds a year; and theſe payments were to continue till four hundred thouſand pounds of the debt were extinguiſhed. They engaged, alſo, during the time that England ſhould continue the war with Spain, to pay the garriſons of the cautionary towns. They ſtipulated, that if Spain ſhould invade England, or the Iſle of Wight, or Jerſey, or Scilly, they ſhould aſſiſt her with a body of five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe; and that, in caſe ſhe undertook any naval armament againſt Spain, they ſhould join an equal number of ſhips to hers. By this treaty Queen Elizabeth was eaſed of an annual charge of an hundred and twenty thouſand pounds (n). In 1600, the Lord Keeper Egerton was again in commiſſion, with the Lord Treaſurer Buckhurſt and the Earl of Eſſex, for negotiating affairs with the Senate of Denmark (o).

The conduct of the Lord Keeper, in regard to that great and extraordinary, but unfortunate, man, the Earl of Eſſex, whoſe name will for ever diſtinguiſh yet diſgrace the annals of Elizabeth, portrays his character in the moſt juſt and amiable features, both as a wiſe and loyal ſubject, and as a ſincere and honeſt friend. Theſe illuſtrious men filled two of the higheſt and moſt important offices of ſtate at the ſame time, and joined in that harmony which ſhould unite all miniſters who have at heart the public intereſts. "They love and join very honourably together," as expreſſed by Anthony Bacon in a letter (p) to Dr. Hawkins, "out of which correſpondency and noble conjunction betwixt Mars and Pallas, betwixt juſtice and valour, I mean betwixt ſo admirable a Nobleman as the Earl, and ſo worthy a Juſtice as the Lord Keeper, I doubt not but very famous effects will daily ſpring to her Majeſty's honour, the good of the ſtate, and the comfort of both their Lordſhips particular true friends." —Eſſex is a character which will command the pity and admiration of every age. Poſſeſſed of noble and manly virtues, but an unhappy victim to a temper too high and irritable, which expoſed him to the arts of falſe friends and inſidious enemies; jealous but friendly; honeſt but ambitious; ſanguine but ſincere; intrepid as a ſoldier; importunate as a courtier; reſentful as a man: he did not court, but commanded, the favour of the great Elizabeth—an advantage he either knew not how to uſe, or was not ſufficiently careful to improve. The violence and impetuoſity of his temper, unguarded by diſcretion, laid him open to the frequent and ungenerous attacks of many, who, in the hope of enjoying his honours and emoluments, were aſſiduous to embrace every opportunity to deprive him of the royal favour, and to effect his ruin. The behaviour of the Lord Keeper was very different on every occaſion that occurred, breathing the ſpirit of the moſt ſincere and diſtinguiſhed friendſhip. Senſible of his great merit as a ſoldier, and of his conſtitutional infirmity as a man, he ever earneſtly ſtudied to ſoften the violence and aſperity of his diſpoſition, to ſooth him to moderation, and to reclaim him to the dictates of reaſon and duty. An inſtance of his friendly interference, in 1598, is given by Mr. Camden [E]; by which the high and reſentful ſpirit of Eſſex,

(p) Birch's Memoirs, Vol. II. p. 146.

'an extraordinary ſpeed, her Majeſty hath, ex proprio motu et ſpeciali gratia, advanced Sir Thomas Egerton, with a general applauſe, both of court, city, and country, for the reputation he hath of integrity, law, knowledge, and courage. It was his good hap to come to the place freely, without competitor or mediator; yea, againſt the deſire and endeavour, as it is thought, of the omnipotent couple'—by whom Mr. Bacon undoubtedly meant the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh and his ſon Sir Robert Cecil (20).

[E] An inſtance of his friendly interference, in 1598, is given by Mr. Camden.] Concerning this buſineſs of the peace, and the chuſing ſome meet and able perſon to look after the affairs of Ireland, there grew a ſmart debate between the Queen and Eſſex, none elſe being preſent but the Lord Admiral, Sir Robert Cecyl, Secretary, and Windbank, Clerk of the Signet. For, whereas, ſhe thought Sir William Knolles, uncle to Eſſex, the fitteſt man of any to be ſent into Ireland, and Eſſex obſtinately inſiſted that Sir George Carew was a fitter perſon than he, on purpoſe to rid the Court of him; yet could not by all his perſuaſions draw her to it, quite forgetting himſelf and neglecting his duty, he uncivilly turned his back upon her, and gave her a ſcornful look. She not enduring ſuch behaviour, gave him a box on the ear, and bade him 'be gone and be hanged.' He preſently laid his hand on his ſword; and the Lord Admiral ſtepping between, he ſwore an oath, that 'he neither could nor would put up ſo great an affront and indignity, neither would ſex, which diſdained to brook an inſult from a Queen, was at length ſoftened into a due ſubmiſſion to his royal benefactreſs; in conſequence of which he was pardoned, and

'he have taken it at Henry the Eighth's hands;' and in a great paſſion withdrew himſelf preſently from the court. The Lord Keeper of the Seal, in a grave and ſober letter (21), adviſed him humbly to betake himſelf to the Queen's mercy; alleging, 'that it was the 'beſt way to yield to her anger for the preſent; and to 'remember that of Seneca.—"If the law puniſh one 'that is guilty, he muſt ſubmit to juſtice; if one that 'is innocent, he muſt ſubmit to fortune." If he had 'juſtly offended his prince, he could not make her 'ſatisfaction: if ſhe had offended him, prudence, 'duty, yea, religion itſelf, did require that he ſhould 'ſubmit himſelf to the Queen, to whom he was ſo 'much indebted, foraſmuch as there is no equality 'between a prince and a ſubject.' He anſwered the Lord-Keeper ſtomachfully and paſſionately by a long letter (22), appealing from the Queen to Almighty God, uſing therein theſe and the like expreſſions: 'No ſtorm is more violent and outrageous than the 'anger of a paſſionate prince. The Queen's heart is 'hardened, what I owe as a ſubject I know, and 'what as an Earl and Marſhal of England I know; 'but, how to ſerve as a drudge and ſlave I know not. 'If I ſhould acknowledge myſelf guilty, I ſhould do 'wrong to the truth, and to God the author of truth. 'My whole body is wounded by that one blow. 'Having received this indignity, it was impiety in 'me to ſerve longer. Cannot princes err? Can they 'not wrong their ſubjects? Is any earthly power in'finite? Solomon ſaith, a fool laugheth when he is 'ſtricken. They which get advantage by princes' 'errors and miſdoings, let them take injuries at 'princes' hands. They who believe not the infinite 'omnipotency of Almighty God, may acknowledge 'an infinite power in Royal Majeſty. I that have been 'torn and rent with ſo many wrongs, have long 'enough endured the bitterneſs of injuries at my 'very bowels.' Yet, within a little while after, he became more ſubmiſs, obtained her pardon, and was received again by her into favour, who always thought it leſs miſbeſeeming to offend and anger a man than to hate him. Yet, hereupon his friends began ſhrewdly to fear his ruin, who had obſerved, that fortune is ſeldom reconciled to her foſter-children, whom ſhe hath once forſaken; and Princes more ſeldom to thoſe whom they have before offended (23).

(24) My very good Lord,

'It is often ſeen, that he, that is a ſtander-by, 'ſeeth more than he that playeth the game; and, for 'the moſt part, any man in his own cauſe ſtandeth in 'his own light, and ſeeth not ſo clearly as he ſhould. 'Your Lordſhip hath dealt in other men's cauſes, and 'in great and weighty affairs, with great wiſdom and 'judgment. Now your own is in hand, you are 'not to contemn and refuſe the advice of any that 'love you, how ſimple ſoever. In this order I rank 'myſelf, among others, that love you, none more 'ſimple, and none that loves you with more true and 'honeſt affection; which ſhall plead my excuſe, if 'you ſhall either miſtake or miſconſtrue my words or 'meaning: yet in your lordſhip's honourable wiſdom 'I neither doubt nor ſuſpect the one nor the other. I 'will not preſume to adviſe you, but ſhoot my bolt as 'near the mark as I can, and tell you what I think.

'The beginning and long continuance of this ſo unſeaſonable diſcontent you have ſeen and proved, by 'which you may aim at the end. If you hold ſtill 'your courſe, which hitherto you find worſe and 'worſe, (and the longer you tread this path, the 'farther you are ſtill out of the way,) there is little 'hope or likelihood that the end will be better than 'the beginning. You are not ſo far gone, but you 'may well return. The return is ſafe, but the pro'greſs dangerous and deſperate in this courſe you 'hold. If you have any enemies, you do that for 'them, which they could never do for themſelves; 'whilſt you leave your friends to open ſhame and con'tempt, forſake yourſelf, overthrow your fortunes, 'and ruinate your honour and reputation; giving 'that comfort to our foreign foes, as greater they 'cannot have. For what can be more welcome and 'pleaſing news to them than to hear, that her Majeſty 'and the realm are maimed of ſo worthy a member, 'who hath ſo often and ſo valiantly quailed and 'daunted them? You forſake your country, when it 'hath moſt need of your help and counſel: and, 'laſtly, you fail in your indiſſoluble duty, which you 'owe to your moſt gracious ſovereign; a duty not 'impoſed upon you by nature and policy only, but 'by the religious and ſacred bond, in which the 'divine majeſty of God hath, by the rules of Chriſ'tianty, obliged and bound you.

'For the four firſt, your conſtant reſolution may 'perhaps move you to eſteem them as light; but, 'being well weighed, they are not lightly to be re'garded: and, for the two laſt, it may be your private 'conſcience may ſtrive to content yourſelf; but it is 'enough. Theſe duties ſtand not alone in con'templation and inward meditation; their effects are 'external, and cannot be performed but by external 'actions; and where that faileth, the ſubſtance itſelf 'faileth.

'Now this being your preſent ſtate and condition, 'what is the beſt to be done herein? and what is the 'beſt remedy for the ſame? My good Lord, I want 'wiſdom and lack judgment to adviſe you; but I will 'never want an honeſt and true heart to will and wiſh 'you well; nor, being warranted by a good con'ſcience, forbear to ſpeak what I think. I have be'gun plainly. I hope your Lordſhip will not be of'fended, if I proceed ſtill after the ſame faſhion. 'Benè cedit, qui tempori cedit. And SENECA ſaith, 'Lex ſi nocentem punit, cedendum eſt juſtitiæ; ſi inno'centem, cedendum eſt fortunæ. The beſt remedy is 'not to contend and ſtrive, but humbly to ſubmit. 'Have you given cauſe, and yet take ſcandal to your'ſelf? Why, then all you can do is too little to make 'ſatisfaction? Is cauſe of ſcandal given to you? Yet 'policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to ſue, yield, 'and ſubmit, to your ſovereign, between whom and 'you there can be no proportion of duty. And GOD 'himſelf requireth it as a principal bond of ſervice to 'himſelf.—When it is evident, that great good may 'enſue of it to your friends, your country, and ſove'reign, and extreme harm by the contrary, there can 'be no diſhonour or hurt to yield; but in not doing 'it is diſhonour and impiety. The difficulty, my 'good Lord, is to conquer yourſelf, which is the 'height of all true valour and fortitude, whereunto 'all your honourable actions have tended. Do it in 'this, and GOD will be pleaſed, her Majeſty well 'ſatisfied, your country will take good, and your 'friends comfort by it: yourſelf (I mention you laſt, 'for I know of all theſe you eſteem yourſelf leaſt) 'ſhall receive honour, and your enemies (if you have 'any) ſhall be diſappointed of their bitter ſweet hope.

'Thus have I uttered what I think, ſimply and 'truly, and leave you to determine. If I have erred, 'it is error amoris, and not amor erroris. Conſtrue, 'I beſeech you, and accept it, as I mean it, not as 'an advice, but as an opinion to be allowed or can'celled at your pleaſure. If I might conveniently 'have conferred with you myſelf in perſon, I would 'not then have troubled you with ſo many idle blots. 'Yet whatſoever you ſhall judge of this mine opinion, 'be you well aſſured, my deſire is to further all good 'means that may tend to your good. And ſo, 'wiſhing you all honourable happineſs, I reſt,

'Your Lordſhip's moſt ready, although,
'Of many, moſt unable and
'faithful friend,

The Earl's anſwer, dated the 18th of October, was in theſe terms (25):

(25) Ib. p. 386, 387, 388.

'My very good Lord,

'Although there is not that man this day living, 'whom I would ſooner make a judge of any queſtion, 'that did concern me, than yourſelf; yet muſt you 'give me leave to tell you, that in ſuch a caſe I muſt and again received into her favour. From this unfortunate affair, however, his friends took an omen of his future ruin, under the conviction that princes, once offended, are ſeldom thoroughly reconciled, and that fortune ſeldom takes by the hand him whom ſhe has once forſaken.

On his haſty and unexpected return from the Iriſh expedition, with a mind ſore from ill ſucceſs, and exaſperated by the ſuſpicions and reprehenſions of the Queen, this great General was ſummoned before the Privy Council, ſuſpended from his offices, and committed to the cuſtody of the Lord Keeper, to prevent his return to his aſſociates, and the proſecution of thoſe factious and ambitious deſigns which it was too obvious he had entertained. (q) Under the weight of this diſgrace, and in ſuch a ſituation, the Lord Keeper rendered him all thoſe kind and friendly offices that humanity, the moſt ſenſible, and politeneſs the moſt delicate, could ſuggeſt: and, in all his future conduct in regard to this great unfortunate man, he tempered juſtice with compaſſion; preſerving a proper medium between the duty of the magiſtrate, and the generoſity of the friend [F]. By the moſt popular and well-timed meaſures, he appeaſed the minds of a prejudiced

(q) Camden's Ann. Eliz. 1599.

' appeal from all earthly judges; and, if in any, then ſurely in this, where the higheſt judge on earth hath impoſed upon me, without trial or hearing, the moſt heavy judgment that ever hath been known: but ſince I muſt either anſwer your Lordſhip's arguments, or forſake my juſt defence, I will force mine aching head to do me ſome ſervice for a ſmall hour or two, although againſt my will. I muſt firſt then deny my diſcontent, which was forced, to be any humourous diſcontentment, and that it was unſeaſonable, or of too long continuance. Your Lordſhip ſhould rather condole with me than expoſtulate about the ſame: natural ſeaſons are expected here below; but violent and unſeaſonable ſtorms come from above. There is no tempeſt equal to the paſſionate indignation of a Prince; nor yet at any time is it ſo unreaſonable as when it lighteth upon thoſe who might expect an harveſt of their careful and painful labours. He, that is once wounded, muſt feel ſmart, while his hurt be cured, or that the part be ſenſeleſs; but no cure I expect, her Majeſty's heart being obdurate againſt me; and to be without ſenſe, I cannot, being made of fleſh and blood. But, ſay you, I may aim at the end. I do more than aim, for I ſee an end of all my good fortunes, and have ſet an end to my deſires. In this courſe do I any thing for my enemies? When I was in the court, I found them abſolute: and, therefore, I had rather they ſhould triumph alone than they ſhould have me attendant on their chariots. Do I leave my friends? When I was a courtier, I could yield them no fruits of my love unto them. Now I am become an hermit, they ſhall bear no envy for their love towards me. Do I forſake myſelf, becauſe I do enjoy myſelf? or do I overthrow my fortune, for that I build not a fortune of paper-walls, which every puff of wind bloweth down? Do I ruinate mine honour, becauſe I leave following the purſuit, or wearing the falſe badge or mark of the ſhadow of honour? Do I give courage and comfort to the foreign foe, becauſe I reſerve myſelf to encounter with him? or becauſe I keep my heart from baſeneſs, although I cannot keep my fortune from declining? No, my good Lord, I give every of theſe conſiderations its due right; and, the more I weigh them, the more I find myſelf juſtified from offending in any of them. As to the two laſt objections, that I forſake my country when it hath moſt need of me, and fail in that indiſſoluble duty which I owe unto my ſovereign; I anſwer, that, if my country had at this time any need of my public ſervice, her Majeſty, that governs the ſame, would not have driven me into a private kind of life. I am tied unto my country by two bonds: in public peace, to diſcharge carefully, faithfully, and induſtriouſly, the truſt which is committed unto me; and the other private, to ſacrifice for it my life and carcaſe, which hath been nouriſhed in it. Of the firſt I am freed, being diſmiſſed, diſcharged, and diſabled, by her Majeſty. Of the other, nothing can free me but death; and, therefore, no occaſion of my performance ſhall offer itſelf, but I will meet it half-way. The indiſſoluble duty, which I owe to her Majeſty, is only the duty of allegiance, which I never will nor never can fail in. The duty of attendance is no indiſſoluble duty. I owe her Majeſty the duty of an Earl and of Lord Marſhal of England. I have been content to do her Majeſty the ſervice of a clerk; but can never ſerve her as a villain or ſlave. But yet, you ſay, I muſt give way unto the time. So I do; for, now I ſee the ſtorm come, I put myſelf into the harbour. SENECA ſaith, "we muſt give place unto fortune." I know, that fortune is both blind and ſtrong, and, therefore, I go as far out of her way as I can. You ſay, the remedy, is not to ſtrive. I neither ſtrive nor ſeek for remedy. But, ſay you, I muſt yield and ſubmit. I can neither yield myſelf to be guilty, or this imputation laid upon me to be juſt. I owe ſo much to the Author of all truth, as I can never yield falſehood to be truth, or truth to be falſehood. Have I given cauſe, aſk you, and take ſcandal, when I have done? No; I give no cauſe to take ſo much as Fimbria's complaint againſt me, for I did totum telum corpore recipere. I patiently bear all, and ſenſibly feel all that I then received, when this ſcandal was given me. Nay, more, when the vileſt of all indignities are done unto me, doth religion enforce me to ſue? or doth God require it? Is it impiety not to do it? What, cannot princes err? Cannot ſubjects receive wrong? Is an earthly power or authority infinite? Pardon me, pardon me, my good Lord, I can never ſubſcribe to theſe principles. Let Solomon's fool laugh when he is ſtricken; let thoſe, that mean to make their profit of princes, ſhew to have no ſenſe of princes' injuries; let them acknowledge an infinite abſoluteneſs on earth, that do not believe in an abſolute infiniteneſs in heaven. As for me, I have received wrong, and feel it. My cauſe is good, I know it, and, whatſoever come, all the powers on earth can never ſhew more ſtrength and conſtancy in oppreſſing than I can ſhew in ſuffering whatſoever can or ſhall be impoſed upon me. Your Lordſhip in the beginning maketh yourſelf a looker-on, and me a player of my own game; ſo you can ſee more than I can, yet muſt you give me leave to tell you, in the end of my anſwer, that ſince you do but ſee, and I ſuffer, I muſt of neceſſity feel more than you do. I muſt crave your Lordſhip's patience to give him, that hath a crabbed fortune, licence to uſe a crabbed ſtyle; and yet, whatſoever my ſtyle is, there is no heart more humble to his ſuperiors, nor any more affected towards your Lordſhip, than that of prejudiced people, who then became tumultuous from the injuries and indignities which they ſuppoſed were done to the perſon of their favourite General; aſſerting the Queen's authority, and juſtifying the conduct of the public counſels, without heightening or exaggerating the miſconduct of the unfortunate Earl (r). Notwithſtanding all the humane attentions of the Lord Keeper, by which he endeavoured to ſoften the pungency of Eſſex's remorſe through the whole of a ſix months' confinement in his houſe, the ſufferings and convictions of a proud and ſtubborn, but active, mind, were redoubled by that reflection which aroſe from his perſonal inactivity, and, together with the effects of his confinement, threw him into a fit of illneſs, from which he with difficulty recovered; when, through the intereſt and interceſſion of his guardian, he was permitted to ſee the Queen, and was relieved by ſome reviving hopes of her returning favour (s).

(s) Sidney State-papers, Vol. II. p. 193.

In this ſchool of ſorrow and ſickneſs, and by the admonitions of his two friendly tutors, the Lord Keeper Egerton and Lord Henry Howard, his lofty ſpirit ſtooped to the diſcipline of repentance, and found its relief in religious meditation, changing its habits and diſpoſitions, for a time at leaſt, and inveſting itſelf in the genial virtues of piety, patience, modeſty, and humility, ſo as to give his friends a preſage of his reformation. This penitential conduct reconciled the Queen, who was graciouſly pleaſed to releaſe him, and to declare, that, in what ſhe had done, ſhe conſulted not his ruin, but amendment (t). Still the minds of the people remained prejudiced and diſſatisfied, under a perſuaſion of his innocence and ill treatment; and, to remove the grounds of theſe ſuſpicions and complaints from herſelf and council, ſhe reſolved that his cauſe ſhould have an open hearing, not in the Star-Chamber, but in the Lord Keeper Egerton's houſe, before the Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges, in order that a cenſure might be formally paſſed upon him, but without charge of perfidy. He was there formally accuſed, and heard the ſpeeches againſt him for eleven hours with much patience (u). He opened his reply by offering thanks to God for his mercy, and to the Queen for her clemency, towards him, and proceeded in a ſtrain of great loyalty and humility: but, when he began to excuſe and juſtify his conduct from the charges alleged againſt him, the Lord Keeper Egerton interrupted him in the moſt friendly manner; adviſing him to proceed as he began, and not to claim the merit of obedience by words which his actions had denied him, as it was in vain to cover direct diſobedience by a pretended intention to obey; and, injoining him to throw himſelf upon the mercy and goodneſs of the Queen, and not, by an attempt to alleviate his offences, to extenuate her clemency (w). Eſſex then knelt down, and the Lord Keeper, in form, pronounced his ſentence.—That he ſhould be removed from his place of Counſellor, ſuſpended from his offices of Earl Marſhal and Maſter of the Ordnance, and detained in cuſtody during the Queen's pleaſure. The ſentence was approved by the voices of all the reſt (x); but the Queen commanded that it ſhould not remain upon record, and that he ſhould not be ſuſpended from the Maſterſhip of the Horſe (y), which place ſhe had directed ſhould not be mentioned in the ſentence.

Under theſe auſpicious ſymptoms of reformation he was releaſed, and ſuffered to retire into the country, accompanied with the ſanguine hopes of all his friends; but that ambition, which they thought had been extinguiſhed, was ſmothered only for a time by ſickneſs and confinement. By a keen ſenſe of diſappointment and diſgrace, it ſoon re-kindled, and, blown up by the officious breath of ſeditious ſpirits, burſt out into a blaze, which, in the event, conſumed himſelf. Through the whole of this frantic and tragical drama, the benevolence of the Lord Keeper did not ceaſe to repeat its friendly offices, to ſooth the mind of his great and unfortunate friend, exaſperated to madneſs, to diſpoſe him to duty and moderation, and to diſſuade him from purſuing his dangerous and ſeditious projects. He told him, as he had often done before, that he would become, in the hands of his greateſt enemies, the inſtrument of his own deſtruction; and, by kind perſuaſion, exhorted him to return to his duty and allegiance before it was abſolutely too late; urging the cauſe of his friends, his country, and his ſovereign, and appealing to his honour, conſcience, and religion (z).

When, with his numerous confederates aſſembled in Eſſex-houſe, in the Strand, he was in a ſtate of actual rebellion, the Queen ſent the Lord Keeper, with the Earl of Worceſter, Sir William Jones, Comptroller of the Houſehod (the Earl's uncle), and Lord Chief Juſtice Popham, to know the cauſe of their tumultuous meeting. The gates being kept ſhut, they were, after ſome ſtay, let in by the wicket; but all their ſervants were kept out except the Purſe-bearer with the ſeal. The court-yard was full of company, and the Earl of Eſſex in the midſt, to whom the Lord Keeper Egerton, addreſſing himſelf, ſaid, that he was ſent, with the other gentlemen, by the Queen, to know the cauſe of their concourſe; and, if they had ſuffered any grievances, he promiſed them a fair and equitable redreſs.

To this the Earl of Eſſex anſwered in a louder tone than ordinary—"There is a "plot laid againſt my life, ſome are ſet to ſtab me in my bed; we are perfidiouſly "dealt withal; letters are counterfeited under my name and hand. We are met here "together to defend ourſelves and lives, ſeeing neither my patience nor miſery can aſ-"ſuage the malice of my adverſaries, unleſs they may alſo ſuck my blood." The words of the Lord Keeper were thereupon repeated by Popham. That, "if any ſuch "matter were attempted or intended, it were fit for him to declare it, and to be aſſured "of their faithful relation, and he ſhould not fail of her Majeſty's princely indifferency "and juſtice." The Earl of Southampton complained of the aſſault made upon him by the Lord Grey de Wilton, as he rode along the ſtreet; to which Popham replied, "that juſtice had been done, and the party was in priſon." The Lord Keeper then preſſed the Earl of Eſſex to impart his grievances, if not openly, yet privately, and promiſed ſatisfaction. Upon which the multitude interrupted him, crying, "Away, away, my Lord! they abuſe you, they deſtroy you, they undo you. You "loſe time." The Lord Keeper, putting on his hat, commanded them all on their allegiance to lay down their weapons and depart. Whereupon the Earl of Eſſex, and all the reſt, put on their caps, and going into his houſe, the Lords followed him, as to a private conference, fearing the multitude, who cried out, "Kill them! Stop "them up—keep them for pledges—caſt the great ſeal out of the window!" When they were come into the inner apartments, Eſſex ordered the doors to be bolted upon them, and left them, bidding them "have patience whilſt he ſhould go and "take order with the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs for the City, and that he would "be with them again within an hour." And ſo he left them in the cuſtody of Sir John Davis, Francis Treſham, and Owen Saliſbury, who guarded them with muſkets, primed and cocked. Having tried the diſpoſition of the citizens, and found that none would join him, that the Lord Treaſurer, with Dethick, King at Arms, having entered the City, had proclaimed him and his accomplices traitors, and that the Lord Admiral was advancing with a ſtrong party againſt him, he reſolved to return to his houſe to ſue for the Queen's favour, through the mediation of the Lord Keeper, and his fellow-priſoners. But, when Leviſon, who commanded a party on Ludgate-Hill, had refuſed Sir Ferdinando Gorges (upon Lord Burleigh's prevailing upon the Herald to proclaim Eſſex traitor) the liberty of a free paſſage for Eſſex; Gorges, conſulting his own intereſt, perſuaded the Earl to ſend him to his houſe to diſcharge the priſoners, and to intercede with them to procure him the Queen's pardon, whilſt yet no blood was ſpilt, and the minds of all hung in anxious ſuſpenſe. Eſſex conſented to the releaſe of Popham only, who, refuſing to accept of it unleſs the Lord Keeper had his alſo, Gorges diſcharged them all, and attended them by water to the Court. From Queen's-Hithe, Eſſex at laſt arrived at his houſe, when, angry that the Lord Keeper and the Council were diſcharged, and, abandoning all hopes of ſupport from the City, he proceeded to fortify his houſe. How that great and unhappy nobleman ſurrendered and ſuffered death, is foreign to the preſent article (*). After his ſentence, however, he deſired to ſpeak with ſome of the Privy Council, when the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treaſurer, the Lord Admiral, and Cecyl, were ſent to him. After aſking pardon of the Lord Keeper for detaining him in cuſtody, and of Cecyl for accuſing him in the affair of the Infanta, he informed them that the Queen could never be in ſafety ſo long as he lived (a). If this great and extraordinary character, diſtinguiſhed by eminent virtues and egregious faults, found in the perſon of the Lord Keeper Egerton, a ſincere and faithful friend, though no abettor, he was ſurrounded by a hoſt of artful and malignant enemies, many of whom aſſumed the garb of friendſhip, actuated in their enmity by the moſt ſelf-intereſted and ungenerous views, whoſe memory is tranſmitted to poſterity as the juſt object of contempt, whilſt his will commanded a tribute of pity and compaſſion from every age.

After the execution of Eſſex, with Cuffe, Merrick, Danvers, and Blunt, principal confederates, the Lord Keeper was in a ſpecial commiſſion (b), with others of the firſt dignity, to ſummon all their accomplices, in order to treat and compound with them for the redemption of their eſtates; and, on ſecurity being given for the payment of the fines aſſeſſed, their pardon and redemption were obtained. The next year, 1602, he was again in commiſſion with others of the Privy Council, to reprieve all ſuch perſons convicted of felony as they ſhould think convenient, and to ſend them, for a certain time, to ſome of the Queen's galleys (c). Lord Keeper and the Lord Admiral, accompanied by the Secretary, were deputed by the reſt of the Privy Council to wait upon her there, in order to remind her Majeſty of her intentions indiſcriminately expreſſed, in regard to her ſucceſſor to the crown, and to know her royal will and pleaſure upon that point. To this requeſt ſhe replied, in broken and interrupted accents, "that her throne was a throne of kings, and that ſhe had ſaid that ſhe would not have any mean perſon ſucceed her. At the death of his royal benefactreſs, "who, in wiſdom and felicity of government, "ſurpaſſed all princes ſince Auguſtus, and the glory of whoſe name," ſays Camden, "no oblivion ſhall bury (f)," the care and adminiſtration of the kingdom, with the preſervation of the public peace and ſecurity, devolved upon the Lord Keeper and the other Miniſters of State, till the arrival of King James, her ſucceſſor, from Scotland, who, by his ſign manual, dated at Holy-rood Houſe, 5th of April, 1603, ſignified to the Privy Council, that it was his royal pleaſure that Sir Thomas Egerton ſhould exerciſe the office of Lord Keeper till farther orders. On the 3d of May he waited upon the King at Broxbourne in Hertfordſhire, and reſigned the Great Seal to his Majeſty, who delivered it back again, confirming his office, and commanding him to uſe it as he had done before (g). On the 19th of July, King James cauſed the Great Seal to be broken, and put a new one into his hands, accompanied with a paper of his own writing, by which he created him "Baron of Elleſmere for his good and faithful ſer-"vices, not only in the adminiſtration of juſtice, but alſo in Council, both to the late "Queen and himſelf;" the patent (b) for which title he cauſed to be diſpatched the twenty-firſt of the ſame month. On the twenty-fourth, the day before his royal coronation, he conſtituted him Lord High Chancellor of England (i), which high and important office of ſtate he ſupported for more than twelve years, with a dignity that became an able Miniſter, and with the learning and impartiality that diſtinguiſhed an equitable Judge. On the 25th and 26th of November (k), Henry Lord Cobham, and Thomas Lord Grey de Wilton, were tried by their Peers, the Lord Chancellor ſitting as Lord High Steward. In 1604, he was, with certain other Commiſſioners, authorized, by act of Parliament, to bring about (l) an union betwixt England and Scotland, it being the King's deſire, that, as the two crowns were united in one perſon, an union of the nations might be effected by naturalization. But, differences ariſing between the Houſe of Lords and Houſe of Commons upon this point of the naturalization of the Scotch, he was one of the Lords appointed of the Committee of Conference between the two houſes. The whole of this tranſaction, and the cauſes of its failure, are ſtated at large in the fifth volume of the Parliamentary Hiſtory (m). In 1605, he was appointed High Steward of the City of Oxford [G]. In 1609, he was in commiſſion to compound with all thoſe, who, holding lands by Knight's ſervice, &c. were to pay the aid for making the King's ſon a Knight (n).

At the death of Dr. Bancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, on the 2d of Nov. 1610, the Lord Elleſmere, Lord High Chancellor of England, was the next day unanimouſly elected into that honourable office [H]; and, on the 10th, inſtalled in the Biſhop of Durham's houſe in London (o). At this period,

This appointment was made when James I. granted his Charter of Incorporation to the City of Oxford in the third year of his reign. Here follows ſo much of the Charter as relates to the Lord Chancellor Elleſmere.

[H] Was unanimouſly elected into that honourable office.] In 1612 (Lord Elleſmere being Chancellor of Oxford) a grand controverſy was decided between the Univerſity and City, in which deciſion it was ordered by the King and Council (that whereas there had been ſome doubt whether the Mayor or Chancellor ſhould take the firſt place), that the Chancellor, and in his abſence the Vice-Chancellor, ſhould for ever after take place before the Mayor of the City (29).

that Univerſity was in a very flouriſhing ſtate in point of the number of its members, which amounted to more than 2420; but many of them, and thoſe of the ſenior part, were tainted with very factious and erroneous principles, both of a civil and religious nature. Convinced how deſtructive theſe ideas and principles, inculcated on the minds of the youth of the Univerſity, who were to be called forth to fill the ſeveral departments of Church and State, would be of the future health and proſperity of the conſtitution, he bent his earlieſt attention to eradicate and correct them; for, immediately after his inſtallation, he made a ſpirited effort to explode thoſe Popiſh and Calviniſtical opinions, (which, however oppoſite to each other, at that time infeſted and diſgraced that ſeat of learning), and to ſuppreſs all thoſe who entertained and promoted them [I]: in which attempts he was ſeconded and ſupported by the interference of the King himſelf (p).

The fame of John Williams, Fellow of St. John's College, in Cambridge, as an able ſcholar and accompliſhed preacher, came to the ear of the Lord Chancellor Egerton, [K] who ſent for him, and about Midſummer, 1611, made him his Chaplain (the firſt Chancellor ſince the Reformation who had a domeſtic Chaplain). He allowed Williams, however, to be abſent the year following, that he might ſerve the office of Proctor in that Univerſity: in the courſe of which office he received and entertained the Duke of Wurtemberg, and held a very ſplendid commencement in 1612 (q), when the Lord Chancellor accompanied the Spaniſh Embaſſador on a viſit to Cambridge. Williams preſided as Moderator over the public exerciſes; and the Chancellor was ſo pleaſed with the gracefulneſs of his preſence, the ingenuity of his diſcourſe, and the able conduct of the exerciſes, that, when he took leave of the Univerſity, he ſaid publicly to Williams, that he had behaved himſelf ſo well in his treatment of the Embaſſador, that he was fit to ſerve a King, and that he would ſee him as much welcomed at Court as they were in the Univerſity (r). To this fortunate occurrence, and the ſubſequent friendſhip of his accidental patron, this great Prelate and Politician was indebted for all his future ſucceſs. His learning and ſolid judgment recommended him more and more to the diſcernment of the Lord Chancellor; and his aſſiduity and reſpect ſecured ſuch an intereſt in his favour, that he enriched him by his bounty, and condeſcended to inſtruct him in thoſe parts of knowledge which qualified him for the high ſtations he afterwards filled (s). While he lived in the Chancellor's houſe, his Lordſhip let him into ſeveral myſteries of ſtate; and Williams now commenced Courtier and Politician, being a man of ſhining parts, firm to retain, and apt to improve from, the precepts of his maſter (t), who, before his death, introduced him to the ſpecial notice of the King, by committing to his truſt and management all meſſages and diſpatches on important buſineſs to his Majeſty; at once diſplaying the high opinion he entertained of his ſecrecy and integrity, and raiſing the King's eſtimation of one who had been intruſted by ſo great and prudent a man (u). The ſame year the Lord Chancellor was one of the Lords who ſigned the articles of marriage between the Princeſs Elizabeth, daughter of King James, and the Elector Palatine (w).

The prudence of the Lord Chancellor employed, on all occaſions, the ableſt ſervants and coadjutors, and his affection made choice of the moſt honourable and valuable friends. Beſides the Archbiſhop Williams, Sir Francis Bacon Lord Verulam, was honoured by his friendſhip, and promoted by his favour (x). Bacon was probably firſt introduced to his notice and attention by his ſanguine friend and patron, the Earl of Eſſex (y). That nobleman had warmly and repeatedly preſſed the intereſts of Bacon at Court, particularly on the Lord Keeper Puckering, in order to obtain the office of Solicitor General; and we find Sir Thomas Egerton applying to his predeceſſor for the ſame purpoſe [L]. These two great and learned men lived some years in the habits of intimate friendship and affection, when the health of the Lord Chancellor declining some time before his death, in the year 1615, his Lordship being very ill [N], Sir Francis Bacon, then Attorney General, (whose virtues were never of such a sort as to be too (b) bashful in endeavouring to secure their reward by personal solicitations for preferment,) made an open and earnest application for the office of Chancellor, as appears from the extracts of his Letters inserted in the notes [O].

SIR FRAN. BACON to the King, Feb. 19, 1615.

'Your worthy Chancellor, I fear, goeth his last 'day. God hath hitherto used to weed out such ser-'vants as grew not fit for your Majesty; but now he 'hath gathered to himself one of the choicer plants, a 'true sage or salvia out of your garden: but your 'Majesty's service must not be mortal. Upon this 'heavy accident I pray your Majesty, in all humble-'ness and sincerity, to give me leave to use a few 'words: I must never forget when I moved your 'Majesty for the Attorney's place, that it was your 'own sole act, and not my Lord Somerset's, who, 'when he knew your Majesty had resolved, thrust 'himself into the business to gain thanks; and, 'therefore, I have no reason to pray for saints. I 'shall now again make oblation to your Majesty, first 'of my heart, then of my service; thirdly, of my 'place of Attorney worth 6000l. a year; and, 'fourthly, of my place in the Star-chamber, worth '1600l. a year; and, with the favour and coun-'tenance of a Chancellor, much more. I hope I 'may be acquitted of presumption if I think of it, 'both because my father had the place, and, chiefly, 'because the Chancellor's place, after it went to the 'law, was ever conferred upon some of the learned 'Counsel, and never upon a Judge. For, Audley, was 'raised from King's Serjeant, my father from 'Attorney of the Wards, Bromley from Solicitor, 'Puckering from Queen's Serjeant, Egerton from 'Master of the Rolls, having newly left the Attorney's 'place (39).'

(39) Bacon's ibid. p. 602, &c.

He then proceeds to shew that great inconveniences would follow if the Chancellorship was given either to Lord Coke, Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, Lord Hobart, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, or to Dr. Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, &c.

SIR FRAN. BACON to the King, Feb. 12, 1615.

'My Lord Chancellor's health growing with his 'days, and his resignation being an uncertainty, I 'would be glad you went on with my first motion of 'swearing me Privy-Counsellor. This I desire, not 'so much to make myself more sure of the other, and 'to put it past competition, for herein I rest wholly 'upon the King; but, because I find hourly that I 'need this strength in his Majesty's service.——My 'Lord Chancellor told me yesterday in plain terms, 'that, if the King would ask his opinion touching the 'person that he would commend to succeed him upon 'his death or disability, he would name me for the 'fittest man. You may advise, whether use may not 'be made of this offer (40).'

neſs of his ſpirit, (who, according to the remark of Ben Jonſon, in his Diſcoveries, "That great and grave orator, Lord Chancellor Egerton, being always beſt when moſt "provoked"), threw an additional weight of anxiety upon his mind; to remove which, the King wrote, with his own hand to him, the letter inſerted in the notes [P]. The caſe (d) is too ſingular in itſelf, and was too important in its deciſion, to be paſſed in ſilence. Sir Edward Coke had heard and determined a cauſe at common law, but there was ſome colluſion in the matter; for, the witneſs that knew, and ſhould have related, the truth, was prevailed upon to abſent himſelf, on condition that any one would undertake to excuſe his non-appearance. A pragmatical fellow of the party undertook it: he went with the witneſs to a tavern, called for a gallon of ſack, and bade him drink; and, leaving him in the act of drinking, went immediately into Court. This witneſs was called for, on whoſe evidence the iſſue of the cauſe depended, when the fellow anſwered upon oath, "that he left him in ſuch a condition, that, if he con-"tinued in it but a quarter of an hour, he was a dead man." This evidence of the witneſs's incapacity to come loſt the cauſe. The plaintiffs removed it into Chancery; and the defendants, having already had judgment at common law, refuſed to obey the orders of that Court; on which the Chancellor, for contempt of Court, committed them to priſon. They preferred two indictments againſt his Lordſhip the laſt day of Hilary Term (e), and he was threatened with a præmunire in the Star-Chamber upon the Statutes, 27 Edw. III. and 4 Hen. IV. Sir Francis Bacon's account of the effect this had upon the mind of the Chancellor, his ſentiments upon the whole of this extraordinary tranſaction, and his opinion of the point of law (who was Attorney General at that time), will appear by the extracts from his letters inſerted in the notes [Q], The

'My Lord,

'Theſe ſhall firſt congratulate and thank God 'with you for your recovery and growing to health 'again; for which I proteſt to God I prayed every 'morning and eve, ſince you was at the worſt, as 'often as I prayed for myſelf: and, next, you ſhall be 'hereby informed how ſenſible I am of that diſgrace 'offered to that Court of mine, wherein you ſit, 'eſpecially at a time ſo unſeaſonable; it cannot but 'be a comfort to you to know how every man cen-'ſured the partiality and barbarity of that action: 'and, for my part, you may aſſure yourſelf it ſhall 'only be in your default of not informing me, if I do 'not upon this occaſion free myſelf from the infection 'of any ſuch inconveniences hereafter; I mean, of 'ſuch jarring betwixt my Courts of Juſtice; for, I 'will wholly relie upon your information and advice 'what courſe to take in the handling of this buſineſs; 'aſſuring myſelf, that your conſcience and care for 'my honour and ſervice will ſet me in a courſe for 'making ſuch an example in this caſe as may ſettle 'good government in like caſes hereafter: and ſo I 'bid you heartily farewell (41).

[Q] From his letters inſerted in the notes.] 'It may 'pleaſe your excellent Majeſty.——I do find, God be 'thanked, a ſenſible amendment in my Lord Chan-'cellor. I was with him yeſterday in private con-'ference about half an hour; and this day again at 'ſuch a time as he did ſeal, which he endured well 'almoſt the ſpace of an hour, though the vapour of 'wax be offenſive to him. He is free from a fever, 'perfect in the powers of memory and ſpeech, and 'not hollow in his voice or looks. But whoever 'thinketh his diſeaſe is but melancholy, he maketh 'no true judgment of it; for, it is plainly a formed 'and deep cough, with a pectoral ſurcharge; ſo that 'at times he doth almoſt animam agere.—I am as glad 'to advertiſe your Majeſty of the amendment of your 'Chancellor's perſon, as I am ſorry to accompany it 'with an advertiſement of the ſickneſs of your Chan-'cery-court: though (by the grace of God) that cure 'will be eaſier than the other. It is true, I did lately 'write to your Majeſty, that for the matter of the 'habeas corpora I did think the communion in ſervice 'between by Lord Chancellor and my Lord Chief 'Juſtice, in the great buſineſs of examination, would 'ſo join them as they would not ſquare at this time: 'but pardon me, if I have too reaſonable thoughts. 'And yet that which happened the laſt day of the 'term concerning certain indictments in the nature of 'Præmunire preferred into the King's Bench, but not 'found, is not ſo much as is voiced abroad; though, 'I muſt ſay, it was omni tempore nimium, et hoc tempore 'alienum, and therefore I beſeech your Majeſty not to 'give believing ear to reports, but to receive the 'truth from me that am your Attorney-General, and 'ought to ſtand indifferent for juriſdictions of all 'courts; which account I cannot give your Majeſty 'now, becauſe I was then abſent, and ſome are now 'abſent, which are properly and authentically to in-'form me touching that which paſſed (42).'

SIR FRAN. BACON to the King, 15 Feb. 1615.

'Sir, I received this morning your two letters. 'In this difference between the two Courts, I marvel 'not, if rumor get way of true relation; but within 'theſe two days I will write to his Majeſty both the 'narrative truly and my opinion ſincerely. I pur-'poſe to ſpeak with my Lord Chancellor this day, 'and ſo to exhibit that cordial of his Majeſty's grace, 'as I hope that other accident will rather rouſe and 'raiſe his ſpirit than deject him and incline him to 'relapſe. Meanwhile, I recommend the wit of a 'mean man, that ſaid this the other day——"Well, 'the next term you ſhall have an old man come with a 'beeſom of wormwood in his hand that will ſweep 'away all this:" for, it is my Lord's faſhion, eſpecially 'towards the ſummer, to carry a poſy of worm-'wood (43).'

SIR FRANCIS BACON to Sir George Villiers, 19 Feb. 1615.

'It may pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty, I was 'yeſterday in the afternoon with my Lord Chancellor, 'according to your commandment, which I received 'by the Maſter of the Horſe, and find the old man 'well comforted, both towards God, and towards the 'world; and that ſame middle comfort, which is divine 'and humane, proceeding from your Majeſty, being 'God's lieutenant on earth, I am perſuaded hath been 'a great cauſe that ſuch a ſickneſs hath been portable 'to ſuch an age. I did not fail in my conjecture, 'that this buſineſs of the Chancery hath ſtirred him; 'he ſheweth to deſpiſe it, but he is full of it, and 'almoſt like a young duelliſt that findeth himſelf 'behind-hand.

'I will now, as your Majeſty requireth, give you a 'true relation of that which hath paſſed; neither will 'I decline your royal commandment for delivering 'my opinion alſo, though it be a tender ſubject to 'write on; but I, that account my being but as an 'accident to my ſervice, will neglect no duty upon 'ſelf-ſafety.

'Firſt

The Lord Chancellor, being recovered from his indiſpoſition, in Eaſter Term purſued this affair concerning the juriſdiction of the Courts of Chancery and the King's Bench with

'Firſt, it is neceſſary I let your Majeſty know the 'ground of the difference between the two Courts, 'that your Majeſty may the better underſtand the 'narrative.

'There was a ſtatute made by 27 Edw. III. c. 1. 'which, no doubt, in the principal intention thereof, 'was ordained againſt thoſe that ſued to Rome; 'wherein there are words ſomewhat general againſt any 'that queſtioneth or impeacheth any judgment given 'in the King's Courts, or in any other Courts. Upon 'theſe doubtful words (other Courts) the controverſy 'groweth. For, the ſounder interpretation taketh 'them to be meant of thoſe Courts, which though 'locally they were not held at Rome, or where the 'Pope's chair was, but here within the realm, yet, 'in their juriſdiction had their dependence upon the 'Court of Rome; as were the Court of the Legate 'here, and the Courts of the Archbiſhops and 'Biſhops, which were then but ſubordinate judgment-'ſeats to that high tribunal of Rome. And for this 'conſtruction, the oppoſition of the words (if they 'be well obſerved) between the King's Courts and 'other Courts, maketh very much; for, it importeth 'as if thoſe other Courts were not the King's Courts. 'Alſo the main ſcope of the ſtatute fortifieth the ſame; 'and, laſtly, the practice of many ages. The other 'interpretation (which cleaveth to the letter), ex-'poundeth the King's Courts to be the Courts of Law 'only, and other Courts to be the Courts of Equity, 'as the Chancery, Exchequer Chamber, Duchy, &c. 'Though this alſo flyeth indeed from the letter, for 'that all theſe are the King's Courts.

'There is alſo another ſtatute, which is but a 'ſimple prohibition, and not with a penalty of a 'præmunire, (as the other is,) that, after judgment 'given in the King's Courts, the parties ſhall be in 'peace, except the judgment be undone by error or 'attaint, which is a legal form of reverſal. And of 'this alſo I hold the ſounder interpretation to be to 'ſettle poſſeſſions againſt diſturbances, and not to take 'away remedy in equity, where thoſe judgments are 'obtained, ex rigore juris, and againſt good con-'ſcience.

'But, upon theſe two ſtatutes there hath been a 'late conceit in ſome, that if a judgment paſs at the 'common law againſt any, that he may not after ſue 'for relief in Chancery; and, if he doth, both he and 'his counſel and his ſolicitors, yea and the judge in 'equity himſelf, are within the danger of thoſe ſta-'tutes.

'Here your Majeſty hath the true ſtate of the 'queſtion, which I was neceſſarily to open to you 'firſt, becauſe your Majeſty calleth for this relation; 'not as news but as buſineſs. Now to the hiſtorical 'part.

'It is the courſe of the King's-Bench, that they give 'in charge to a grand jury offences of all natures to be 'preſented within Middleſex, where the ſaid Court 'is; and the manner is, to enumerate them as it were 'in articles. This was done by Juſtice Crook, the 'Wedneſday before the term ended. And that 'article (If any man, after judgment given, had drawn 'the ſaid judgment to a new examination in any other 'Court) was by him ſpecially given in charge which 'had not uſed to be given in charge before. It is true, 'it was not ſolemnly dwelt upon, but, as it were, 'thrown in amongſt the reſt.

'The laſt day of the term, (and that which all 'men condemn, the ſuppoſed laſt day of my Lord 'Chancellor's life,) there were two indictments pre-'ferred of præmunire, for ſuing in Chancery after 'judgment in common law; the one by Richard 'Glanville, the other by William Allen: the former 'againſt Courtney, the party in Chancery, Gibb the 'counſellor, and Deurſt the clerk; the latter againſt 'Alderman Bowles and Humphrey Smith, parties in 'in Chancery; Serjeant More the counſellor, Elias 'Wood ſolicitor in the cauſe, and Sir John Tindal, 'Maſter of the Chancery, and an aſſeſſor to my Lord 'Chancellor.

'For the caſes themſelves, it were too long to 'trouble your Majeſty with them; but this I will 'ſay, if they were ſet on that preferred them, they 'were the worſt markſmen that ever were that ſet 'them on. For, there could not have been choſen 'two ſuch cauſes to the honour and advantage of the 'Chancery, for the juſtneſs of the decrees, and the 'foulneſs and ſcandal of fact and perſon, in thoſe 'that impeach the decrees. The grand jury conſiſt-'ing (as it ſeemeth) of very ſubſtantial and intelli-'gent perſons, would not find the bills, notwithſtand-'ing they were clamoured by the parties, and twice 'ſent back by the Court; and, in concluſion, reſo-'lutely ſeventeen of nineteen found an ignoramus; 'wherein, for that time, I think, ignoramus was 'wiſer than thoſe that know too much.

'Your Majeſty will pardon me, if I be ſparing in 'delivering to you ſome other circumſtances of aggra-'vation, and of concurrences of ſome like matters 'the ſame day; as if it had been ſome fatal conſtel-'lation. They be not things ſo ſufficiently tried as I 'dare put them into your ear.

'For my opinion, I cannot but begin with this 'preface, that I am infinitely ſorry that your Majeſty 'is thus put to ſalve and cure, not only accidents of 'time, but errors of ſervants; for I account this a 'kind of ſickneſs of my Lord Coke's, that comes 'almoſt in as ill a time as the ſickneſs of my Lord 'Chancellor. And, as I think, it was one of the 'wiſeſt parts that ever he played, when he went down 'to your Majeſty to Royſton, and deſired to have my 'Lord Chancellor joined with him; ſo this was one 'of the weakeſt parts that ever he played, to make 'all the world perceive that my Lord Chancellor is 'ſevered from him at this time.

'But, for that which may concern your ſervice, 'which is my end, (leaving other men to their own 'ways;) firſt, my opinion is plainly, that my Lord 'Coke, at this time, is not to be diſgraced; both 'becauſe he is ſo well habituate for that which re-'maineth of theſe capital cauſes; and alſo, for that 'which I find is in his breaſt, touching your finances 'and matters of repair of your eſtate; and, if I 'might ſpeak it, as I think it were good his hopes 'were at end in ſome kind, ſo I could wiſh they were 'raiſed in ſome other.

'On the other ſide, this great and publick affront, 'not only to the reverend and well-deſerving perſon 'of your Chancellor, (and at a time when he was 'thought to lie on dying, which was barbarous) but 'to your high Court of Chancery, which is the 'Court of your abſolute power, may not, in my 'opinion, paſs lightly, nor end only in ſome formal 'atonement, but uſe is to be made thereof for the 'ſettling of your authority and ſtrengthening of 'your prerogative, according to the true rules of 'monarchy.

'Now to reconcile and accommodate theſe two 'advices, which ſeem almoſt oppoſite: Firſt, your 'Majeſty may not ſee it, though I confeſs it be ſuſ-'picious, that my Lord Coke was any way afore-'hand privy to that which was done; or that he did 'ſet it or animate it, but only took the matter as it 'came before him; and that his error was only, that 'at ſuch a time he did not divert it in ſome good 'manner.

'Secondly, if it be true, as it is reported, that any 'of the puiſne judges did ſtir this buſineſs; or that 'they did openly revile and menace the jury for doing 'their conſcience; as they did honeſtly and truly, 'I think that judge is worthy to loſe his place. And 'to be plain with your Majeſty, I do not think there 'is any thing a greater polychreſton, or ad multa utile, 'to your affairs, than upon a juſt and fit occaſion to 'make ſome example againſt the preſumption of a 'judge in cauſes that concern your Majeſty, whereby 'the whole body of thoſe magiſtrates may be con-'tained the better in awe; and, it may be, this will 'light upon no unfit ſubject of a perſon, that is rude, 'and that no man cares for.

'Thirdly,

with great ſpirit and alacrity; and, it being brought to a hearing before the King as ſupreme judge of the juriſdiction of Courts, he uſed the utmoſt care to inform himſelf therein, and referred the ſame to Sir Francis Bacon and Sir Henry Yelverton, his Attorney and Solicitor, Sir Henry Montague and Sir Ranulph Crewe, his Serjeants, and Mr. Walter, the Prince's Attorney, all eminent men in their profeſſion, who, upon a ſerious conſideration of the ſtatutes, and the occaſion of making them, and of the precedents ſince that time, in April, 1616, preſented the King with their opinions and reaſons why they conceived theſe ſtatutes did not extend to the Court of Chancery. Conſonant to this reſolution, his Majeſty, upon farther advice (f), gave judgment in July following.—" That the ſtatute of 27 E. III. ch. 1. and 4 Hen. IV. did not extend " to the Court of Chancery: for the firſt was enacted againſt thoſe who ſued at Rome, " and the latter was deſigned to ſettle poſſeſſions againſt diſturbances, and not to take " away remedy in equity (g). [R] Upon this, his Majeſty ordered the caſe, the certificate, (g) Life of K. James I. by R. Wilſon, ann. 1616. Ar. Collins, as above.

' Thirdly, if there be no one ſo much in fault, ' which I cannot yet affirm either way, and there ' muſt be a juſt ground, God forbid elſe, yet I ſhould ' think, that the very preſumption of going ſo far, in ' ſo high a cauſe, deſerveth to have that done, which ' was done upon the indictment of Serjeant Heale, in ' Queen Elizabeth's time; that the judges ſhould ' anſwer it upon their knees before your Majeſty or ' your council, and receive a ſharp admonition: at ' which time alſo, my Lord Wray, being then Chief ' Juſtice, ſlipt the collar and was forborn.

' Fourthly, for the perſons themſelves, Glanville ' and Allen, which are baſe fellows and turbulent, I ' think there will be diſcovered and proved againſt ' them, beſides the preferring of the bills, ſuch com- ' binations and contemptuous ſpeeches and behaviours, ' as there will be good ground to call them, and, ' perhaps, ſome of their petty counſellors at law, in- ' to the Star-chamber.

' In all this which I have ſaid, your Majeſty may ' be pleaſed to obſerve, that I do not engage you ' much in the main point of the juriſdiction, for which ' I have a great deal of reaſon, which I now forbear. ' But two things I wiſh to be done: the one, that ' your Majeſty take this occaſion to redouble unto all ' your judges your ancient and true charge of rule, ' that you will endure no innovating the point of ' juriſdiction, but will have every Court impaled ' within their own precedents, and not aſſume to ' themſelves new powers upon conceits and inventions ' of law: the other, that in theſe high cauſes that ' touch upou ſtate and monarchy, your Majeſty give ' them ſtreight charge, that, upon any occaſions in- ' tervenient hereafter, they do not make the vulgar ' party to their conteſtations, by publickly handling ' them before they have conſulted with your Majeſty ' to whom the reglement of thoſe things only apper- ' taineth.

' To conclude, I am not without hope, that your ' Majeſty managing this buſineſs according to your ' great wiſdom, unto which I acknowledge myſelf ' not to be worthy to be card-holder or a candle- ' holder, will make profit of this accident as a thing ' of God's ſending.

' Laſtly, I may not forget to repreſent to your ' Majeſty, that there is no thinking of arraignments ' until theſe things be ſomewhat accommodated, and ' ſome outward and ſuperficial reconciliation at leaſt ' made between my Lord Chancellor and my Lord ' Chief Juſtice; for this accident is a banquet to all ' the delinquent's friends. But this is a thing that ' falleth out naturally of itſelf, in reſpect of the ' judges going circuit, and my Lord Chancellor's in- ' firmity with hope of recovery: and, although this ' protraction of time may breed ſome doubt of muta- ' bility, yet, I have lately learned out of an excel- ' lent letter of a certain king, that the ſun ſheweth ' ſometimes watery to our eyes, but, when the cloud ' is gone, the ſun is as before. God ever preſerve ' your Majeſty (44)!

' Your Majeſty's moſt humble
' ſubject and bounden ſervant,

[R] And thereupon his Majeſty ordered the caſe, &c.] ' This matter, (ſays Sir William Blackſtone in his ' Comment. Book 3. cap. 4.) being brought before ' the King was by him referred to his learned counſel ' for their advice and opinion: who reported ſo ſtrongly ' in favour of the Courts of Equity, that his Majeſty ' gave judgment in their behalf; but, not contented ' with the irrefragable reaſons and precedents pro- ' duced by his counſel (for the Chief Juſtice was ' clearly in the wrong) he choſe rather to decide the ' queſtion by referring it to the plenitude of his ' Royal prerogative.' We are obliged to Francis Hargrave, Eſq. for the following note on the controverſy about equitable juriſdiction.

Whether the Chancery can relieve by ſubpœna, after a judgment at law in the ſame matter, was the chief point in controverſy between Lord Chancellor Elleſmere and Lord Chief Juſtice Coke. The latter reſiſted the equitable interpoſitions on various occaſions. In one caſe, the King's Bench, whilſt he preſided over it, made a judgment abſolute, and granted execution in ſpite of an injunction from Chancery (45). In another caſe, he, and the other judges of the King's Bench, firſt bailed and afterwards diſcharged one, who had been committed for diſobedience to a decree in Chancery, where that Court interpoſed after a judgment at law (46). In a third caſe, where the defendant in Chancery, having been committed for contumacy in not anſwering, was brought by habeas corpus before the King's Bench, Coke held a language, which made it apparent, that he would have gone the ſame length, if it had been clear, that the bill in Chancery was for the ſame matter as the judgment at law; and, in this, he was ſtrongly ſeconded by Judge Doderidge (74). The grounds on which Lord Coke thus proceeded are ſtated by himſelf, both in his third and fourth inſtitutes (48). Certain alſo it is, that he did not act without at leaſt the colour and ſemblance of precedents and authorities in his favour. In the reign of Edward the fourth, Huſſey, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, avowed, that, if the party impriſoned by Chancery in a like caſe required it, he would have acted on the ſame line of conduct (49). In the reign of Henry the Eighth, Sir Thomas Moore, whilſt he was Lord Chancellor, joined the Houſe of Lords in charging it as a crime againſt Cardinal Wolſey, that he had examined matters in Chancery after a judgment at law (50). In the ſame reign, even the moſt zealous advocates for the equitable juriſdiction of Chancery diſavowed the right to interfere after a judgment at law, as is evident from the writings of the author of " The Doctor and Student." In the reign of Elizabeth, three indictments of præmunire on the Statute of 27 Edw. 3. are ſtated to have been found againſt different perſons for obtaining ſubpœnas after judgment at law; one in the 8 & 9 Eliz. whilſt Sir Nicholas Bacon was Lord Keeper; a ſecond in 27 Eliz. whilſt Sir Thomas Bromley held the ſeals; and a third in 30 Eliz. in which laſt inſtance it is repreſented that the Court of King's Bench, on exceptions taken, decided that the caſe was within the ſtatute, though they quaſhed the indictment for miſtake of a name (51). Theſe caſes are alſo ſaid to have been followed by ficate, and the tranſactions thereupon, to be enrolled in the Court of Chancery (b). This foul affair greatly ſerved to haſten Lord Chief Juſtice Coke's diſgrace [S], and is mentioned by Mr. Stephens as the firſt of the cauſes which deprived the Chief Juſtice of his place before the expiration of the ſame year (i).

The Lord Chancellor, having repelled, with credit and ſucceſs, this extraordinary attack made through the haughty and vindictive ſpirit of Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, and being recovered from his indiſpoſition, was, on the 12th of May, 1616, conſtituted Lord High Steward for the trial of Robert, Earl of Somerſet, and Frances his wife, for poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury. This ſolemn trial commenced on the 24th of May, when the Counteſs of Somerſet was brought into Weſtminſter-Hall. The Lord High Steward came on horſe-back, preceded by the proper officers of ſtate, and others of the nobility, and followed by two Barons, and two Knights on horſeback. The Counteſs (k), pleading guilty, was condemned; and, appealing to the mercy of her Peers, and interceding for their intereſt with the King to ſpare her life, was the object of univerſal pity. The Earl was tried the day following, and was found guilty of felony (l). After their conviction the Chancellor reſolutely and conſiſtently refuſed to affix the Great Seal to the very extraordinary pardon granted, and already ſigned by the too indulgent lenity of the King, which was copied from one granted by the Pope to Cardinal Wolſey, and which ran in theſe words: "That the King, of his mere motion and ſpecial favour, "did pardon all and all manner of treaſons, miſpriſions of treaſons, murders, felonies, "and outrages whatſoever, by the ſaid Robert Carre, Earl of Somerſet, committed, or "hereafter to be committed (m)."

On the 20th of May following, he was conſtituted one of the Commiſſioners to treat with Sir Noel Caroon, Knight, Embaſſador for the States General, concerning the rendition of the cautionary towns into the hands of the States (n). On the 3d of June, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and others, were appointed to enquire who were the authors of his being indicted of præmunire (o), which was the leading cauſe of Sir Edward Coke's diſgrace. He was one of the grand council, convened at Whitehall on the 6th of June, 1616, the King himſelf, in council, before whom the twelve Judges were ſummoned to appear, and accuſed of having, in the execution of their office, unconſtiby another of the 39 & 40 Eliz. in which, on a demurrer to a bill in Chancery after judgment at law, there was a reference to all the Judges of England, who are ſtated to have concurred in certifying that the demurrer was good. Sir Moyle Finch's caſe (52). Whether the weight of authorities, and of the reaſoning independently of them, did on the whole preponderate for or againſt Lord Coke, is a point upon which it would be raſh to pronounce without a very cloſe and accurate inveſtigation. In the mean time it muſt be confeſſed, that, without taking into account the high eſtimation of the venerable Lord Elleſmere's character, there is ſeemingly great preſumption in favour of his ſide of the controverſy; for it not only terminated with a deciſion againſt Lord Coke, but that deciſion, notwithſtanding various attempts to unhinge it, ſtill operates with full force. The deciſion againſt Lord Coke was in 1616, when the Attorney General Bacon, the Solicitor-General, and the King's Serjeants, having certified in favour of Chancery on a caſe referred to them by the crown, King James declared his approbation, and iſſued a rule for direction of Chancery accordingly. Nor was this the full extent of Lord Elleſmere's victory; for, Lord Coke was called to a ſevere account for his conduct in this ſtrife about juriſdiction, and found it convenient to make a very humiliating ſubmiſſion. However, it appears by the third Inſtitute, that Lord Coke conſidered the victory as obtained by undue means, and did not really relinquiſh his original notions on the ſubject (53).

(52) Ibid.

(53) 3 Inſt. 125.

Such was the effect of King James's deciſion in favour of equitable juriſdiction, that Lord Coke did not live to ſee a revival of the attempts to check it.

But, within a few years after Lord Coke's death, the queſtion of equitable juriſdiction was again ſtirred, and, as it ſeems, not wholly without ſucceſs. In 17 Cha. I. it is reported to have been agreed in the King's Bench, that a Court of Equity could not relieve after judgment at law (54). In 1655, the like queſtion was moved againſt the equitable juriſdiction of the Exchequer, and a demurrer to a bill after judgment at law was there allowed (55). In 1658, another caſe was argued in the Exchequer on the ſame point: but no judgment appears to have been given (56).

(56) Harris v. Colliton Hardr. 123.

After the Reſtoration there occurred on this ſubject the two caſes following: namely (57), The former was a caſe of demurrer on action of præmunire in the King's Bench. It began whilſt Kelynge was Chief Juſtice; who, after argument, thought it a fit caſe for adjournment into the Exchequer Chamber (58). But, afterwards, when Lord Hale was become Chief Juſtice, he is ſaid to have held that the caſe was not within the ſtatute of præmunire, on which nothing farther was done in the caſe (59). In the latter caſe, a judgment at law had been pleaded to a bill in Chancery; and, on the plea's being overruled, a prohibition was moved for in the King's Bench, when Lord Hale recommended that it ſhould be moved in Chancery to have the plea ſet down again; and he ſaid, that, if it ſhould be overruled again, then the court would conſider, whether a prohibition ſhould be granted (60).

Thus reſted the diſpute till 1695, when it was once more revived by Sir Robert Atkyns, who, almoſt immediately after reſigning the office of Lord Chief Baron publiſhed an elaborate treatiſe againſt the equitable juriſdiction of Chancery, in which he particularly inſiſted that it could not interpoſe after a judgment at law. This treatiſe he addreſſed to the Lords; but, as far as appears at preſent, neither this nor a ſubſequent publication in 1699 by Sir Robert on the juriſdiction of the Peers, in which he again inveighed againſt Chancery, produced the leaſt effect: on the contrary, the juriſdiction of equity, as well after as before judgment, has been ever ſince exerciſed without controverſy or interruption.

[S] Lord Chief Juſtice Coke's diſgrace.] In a letter from Sir Francis Bacon to Lord Chief Juſtice Coke in diſgrace, he mentions the following, among the faults and miſconduct that occaſioned it. 'You make 'the law to lean too much to your own opinion, 'whereby you ſhew yourſelf to be a legal tyrant, 'ſtriking with that weapon when you pleaſe, ſince 'you are able to turn the edge any way: for thus the 'wiſe maſter of the law (viz. the Chancellor) gives 'warning to young ſtudents, that they ſhould be 'wary, leſt while they hope to be inſtructed by your 'integrity and knowledge, they ſhould be deceived 'with your ſkill armed with authority (61).'

The King himſelf took an active part in this buſineſs, and, after a judicial diſcuſſion of the queſtion, in which the opinion of Sir Francis Bacon, the Attorney General, was ſeconded and confirmed by that of the Chancellor, they were ſeverely cenſured for having groſsly and wilfully erred both in the matter and manner of their proceedings; particularly in not obeying the royal command delivered to them by the Attorney General, and in not delaying to proceed in a cauſe in which the prerogative was concerned till they had conſulted his Majeſty, and known his farther pleaſure. They all ſubmitted willingly, except the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke (in the whole of which buſineſs he acted a very noble part), and were obliged to crave his Majeſty's gracious favour and pardon upon their knees (q). On the 20th, the King, in the Star-chamber, aſſerted the authority of the Chancellor as more eſpecially his own; and, on the 30th, Lord Chief Juſtice Coke was degraded [T] for ſeveral cauſes of offence, particularly thoſe two which have been juſt mentioned, viz. his attack upon the Chancellor, and the affair of the Commendams (r).

The Lord Chancellor was now more than 76 years of age, and feeling both the powers of his mind and body ſhrink under the preſſure of old age and infirmity, by the moſt earneſt ſolicitations he entreated the King to give him an honourable diſcharge from his high office; partly from a ſcrupulous apprehenſion and conſcientious diffidence of being competent to bear the fatigues, and to diſcharge the duties, of it as he ought; but principally from an ardent deſire to retreat from the buſy ſcenes of office, in order to devote the evening of a life, ſpent in the honeſt and faithful diſcharge of a high profeſſion, to religious meditation.

" Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" I find, through my great age accompanied with griefs and infirmities, my ſenſe and " conceipt is become dull and heavy, my memory decayed, my judgment weak, my " hearing imperfect, my voice and ſpeech failing and faultering, and in all the powers " and faculties of my mind and body great debility. Wherefore, conſcientiâ imbecilli- " tatis, my humble ſuit to your moſt ſacred Majeſty is, to be diſcharged of this great " place wherein I have long ſerved, and to have ſome comfortable teſtimony under " your royal hand, that I leave it at this humble ſuit, with your gracious favour; ſo " ſhall I with comfort number and ſpend the days I have to live in meditation, and " prayers to almighty God, to preſerve your Majeſty, and all yours, in all heavenly " and earthly felicity and happineſs. 19th Nov. 1616. A thunderbolt hath fallen on Lord Coke in the King's Bench, which hath overthrown him from the roots. The ſuperſedeas was carried to him the laſt week by Sir George Coppin, who at the preſenting of it ſaw that animoſity and ſuppoſed greatneſs of ſpirit to fall into a very narrow room—for, he received it with dejection and tears—Tremor et Seceſſio non cadunt in fortem et conſtantem.

Mr. JOHN CASTLE to Mr. James Milles. Birch MSS. 4176. 64.

During the time that Lord Chief Juſtice Coke lay under the diſpleaſure of the Court, ſome information was given to the King, that he having publiſhed eleven books of Reports had written many things againſt his Majeſty's prerogative. And being commanded to explain ſome of them, my Lord Chancellor Elleſmere doth thereupon in his letter of 22d October 1616 write thus to the King: 'According to your Majeſty's 'directions ſignified unto me by Mr. Solicitor, I 'called the Lord Chief Juſtice before me on Thurſday 'the 13th inſt. in preſence of Mr. Attorney, and 'others of your learned Counſel. I did let him know 'your Majeſty's acceptance of the few animadverſions, 'which, upon review of his own labours, he had 'ſent, though fewer than you expected, and his ex-'cuſes other than you expected.' And did at the ſame time inform him that his Majeſty was diſſatisfied with ſeveral other paſſages therein. 'Tis true, the Lord Chancellor wiſhed he might have been ſpared all ſervice concerning the Chief Juſtice as remembering the fifth petition of Dimitte nobis debita noſtra, &c. Inſomuch that, though a committee of Judges was appointed to conſider theſe books, yet the matter ſeems to have ſlept till after Sir Francis Bacon was made Lord Keeper it revived, and two Judges more were added to the former (62).

[The Lord Chancellor Elleſmere's wiſh to have been ſpared all ſervice concerning the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke appears to us a teſtimony of his ſenſibility, of his mild diſpoſition, and of the goodneſs of his heart: But this we ſubmit to the better judgment of our readers.]

The King at laſt conſented, though he had endeavoured to induce him, as much as poſſible, to remain in office, as the Prince of Wales likewiſe had done; which appears from two letters [W] they ſent to the Chancellor this year from Newmarket. King James parted with an old and faithful ſervant with all imaginable tenderneſs, and, as a mark of his royal favour and approbation, advanced him to the dignity of Viſcount Brackley (u) on the 7th of November, 1616. Though he then reſigned the duties of that high and important office of ſtate, the King let him, however, keep the ſeal in poſſeſſion till the beginning of Hilary term following, when, according to the accurate Camden, [X] on the 3d of March, 1617, his Ma-

[U] An honourable diſmiſſion.] 'Your royal favour 'hath placed and continued me many years in the 'higheſt place of ordinary juſtice in this your king-'dom, and hath moſt graciouſly born with my many 'but unwilling errors and defects, accepting, inſtead 'of ſufficiency, my zeal and fidelity, which never 'failed. This doth encourage and ſtir in me an 'earneſt deſire to ſerve ſtill: but, when I remember 'St. Paul's rule, "Let him that hath an office wait 'on his office;" and do conſider withal my great age, 'and many infirmities, I am dejected, and do utterly 'faint: for I ſee and feel ſenſibly, that I am not able 'to perform thoſe duties as I ought and the place 'requires; and thereupon I do ſeriouſly examine 'myſelf, what excuſe or anſwer I ſhall make to the 'King of Kings, and Judge of all Judges, when he 'ſhall call me to account; and then my conſcience 'ſhall accuſe me, that I have preſumed ſo long to 'undergo and wield ſo mighty and great a charge 'and burthen; and I behold a great cloud of wit-'neſſes ready to give evidence againſt me.

'1. Reaſon telleth me, and by experience I find, 'Senectus eſt tarda et obliviosa, et inſanabilis morbus.

'2. I heard the precepts and council of many 'reverend, ſage, and learned men, "Senectuti debe-'tur otium," "ſolve ſenectutem mature," &c.

'3. I read, in former laws, that old men were 'emeriti et rude donati; and one ſevere law that 'ſaith, Sexagenarius de ponte, whereupon they are 'called Depontanei. And Plato, lib. 6. de legibus, 'ſpeaking of a great magiſtrate which was Præfectus 'legibus ſervandis determineth thus: Minor annis 50 'non admittatur; nec major annis 70 permittatur in eo 'perſeverare: and, to this law, reſpecting both mine 'office and mine years, I cannot but yield. But, 'leaving foreign laws, the ſtat. anno 13 E. I. ſpeak-'th plainly, Homines excedentes ætatem 70 annorum 'non ponantur in Aſſiſis et juratis. 'So as it appeareth, 'that men of that age are by that law diſcharged of 'greater, painful, and careful, eſpecially judicial, 'offices.

'4. Beſides, I find many examples of men of great 'wiſdom, knowledge, and judgment, meet and 'worthy to be followed; of which, (leaving all other) 'I will remember that of William Warham, Archbiſhop 'of Canterbury, and Chancellor of England, who, after 'long ſervice, was, upon his humble ſuit, diſcharged 'of the office of Chancellor of England, in reſpect of 'his great age. Seeing then ſuch a cloud of witneſſes 'againſt me, which, in my private ſoliloquies and 'meditations, are daily and continually repreſented to 'my view, and mine own conſcience (more than a 'thouſand witneſſes) concurring with me: Pardon 'me, my moſt gracious Sovereign, to conclude 'with good Barzillai, Quot ſunt dies annorum vitæ 'meæ? quare ſervus tuus ſit oneri domino noſtro Regi? 'obſecro ut revertar ſervus tuus et moriar, &c. So I 'moſt humbly beſeech your moſt ſacred Majeſty, 'graciouſly to regard the great age, infirmity, and 'impotency, of your moſt devoted, obedient, loyal, 'and faithful, ſervant: let me not be as Domitius after 'was, Maluit deficere quam deſinere; but, with your 'princely favour, give me leave to retire myſelf from 'the careful ſervice of this great office, and from the 'troubles of this world, and to ſpend the ſmall rem-'nant of my life in meditation and prayer; and I will 'never ceaſe to make my humble ſupplications to 'Almighty God, to bleſs and proſper your Majeſty, 'the Queen, the Prince, all your Royal iſſue, with 'all heavenly and earthly felicity; which is the laſt 'and beſt ſervice your poor, aged, weak, and decayed, 'ſervant can do for you.'

'To the Right Truſty and Right well Beloved 'our Chancellor of England.

'My Lord,

'The letter I wrote the laſt year from the ſame 'town unto you proved ſo good a cordial for your 'health, as I am thereby encouraged to do the like at 'this time; and, as I both hope and pray for, with the 'like ſucceſs: I cannot but be extremely ſorry for 'the evil conceit you have of your own ſtrength, which 'makes me the more to preſume upon the good ope-'ration of this phyſick of mine, ſince I am ſure it 'cannot work more upon your mind than any other 'worldly thing. The greatneſs of your place, and 'the ability which God hath given you to diſcharge 'it, to the honour of God, and the great benefit of 'the commonwealth, it is a cauſe ſufficient to ſtir you 'up to be careful of your own health, and even to 'fight againſt diſeaſes as far as you can; but, when 'you ſhall remember how ill I may want you, and 'what miſs your Maſter ſhall have of you, I hope the 'reaſon will be predominant to make you not ſtrive 'with, but conquer, your diſeaſe, not for your own 'ſake, but for His, of whom you may promiſe your-'ſelf as much love, and hearty affection, as might be 'expected from ſo thankful and kind a maſter, to ſo 'honeſt and worthily deſerving a ſervant: and ſo, 'praying God to bleſs this my cure, I bid you heartily 'farewell.

jesty went to visit the Chancellor, and received it from his hands with tears of gratitude and respect (w) [Y].

On the seventh it was committed to the custody of Sir Francis Bacon (x), the person whom his Lordship desired might succeed him (y). Another author (z) says, that the King sent Secretary Windwood for the seal with this gracious message, "That himself "would be his Underkeeper and not dispose of it, while he lived to bear the title of "Chancellor," and that no one received it out of the King's sight till Lord Chancellor Egerton's death, which followed soon after [Z]: these accounts are very reconcilable, as the King might both receive it in form from the Chancellor's hands and send his Secretary for it afterwards. On the 24th of January, he had, for the same reasons, resigned the office of Chancellor of the University of Oxford [AA], and was succeeded by the Earl of Pembroke.

His Lordship's illness increasing, the King, as a farther testimony of his affection and good-will, and of all that the munificence of a Prince could do to sooth the dying moments of an aged servant, [BB] sent the Earl of Buckingham and Sir Francis Bacon, on the 15th of March, to signify his intention of honouring him with an Earldom, accompanied with an annual pension (a) [CC]. These honours he did not live to receive, but left them in the hands of his royal master to testify a reverence for his memory, and a grateful sense of his services, by conferring the former upon his son, John Egerton, afterwards created Earl of Bridgwater (b). The age in which he lived was a particular æra of the British annals, distinguished by many great and extraordinary public cha-

[Z] Which followed soon after.] This we are assured of by Mr. W. Sanderson, the publisher of "Aulicus Coquinariæ," by way of reply to Sir Anth. Weldon; who, in his "Court and Character of "King James (64)," says, 'that the Lord Chancellor, as well as Sir Robert Mansell, was removed 'by the pride and insolence of Villiers, for not giving 'way to his exorbitant desires, who would not let 'him seal up his dying eyes with the seals which he 'had so long carried and so well discharged. And, 'to despite him the more, and to vex his very soul, 'in the last agony, he sent Bacon (one he hated) yet 'to be his successor for the seales; which the old 'man's spirit could not brook; but sent them by his 'own servant; and, shortly after, yielded his soule 'to his Maker.' Sir Anthony must be wrong in this part of his narration. He hated Villiers himself and Bacon too, (because he had conceived them to have been enemies to Essex,) of which last he says— 'Surely never so many brave parts and so base and 'abject a spirit ever tenanted together in any one 'earthen cottage as in this man (66); and will have 'the Chancellor, whom all men loved, to hate them 'too.' Mr. Stephens, in his Introduction to Bacon's Letters, affirms, 'that he voluntarily resigned in full 'possession of the King's favour, notwithstanding 'what some pamphleteers have reported (67).' Mr. Stephens, in another place, calls Sir Anthony 'a loose 'writer (68).'

At the conference of Divines at Hampton Court concerning Conformity in 1603-4, the Lord Chancellor Elleſmere took occaſion thus to expreſs his opinion. 'Livings rather want learned men, than 'learned men livings, many in the Univerſities pining 'for want of places. I wiſh, therefore, ſome may 'have ſingle coats, before others have doublets: and 'this method I have obſerved in beſtowing the King's 'benefices (72).'

Sir Simon Degge records this conduct of the Lord Chancellor in his "Parſon's Counſellor," page 37, calling it "a worthy Precedent."

In 1612, Francis Rollenſon, B.D. ſome time Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, publiſhed a volume of curious ſermons, entitled, "Twelve Prophetical "Legacies," &c. which he dedicated to Lord Chancellor Elleſmere. In the Dedication he premiſes, that 'Counſel and Helpe be the two maine pillars and 'ſupporters of every Commonwealth:' then he adverts to the value of the Lord Chancellor in theſe reſpects, and records alſo his exemplary attention to the intereſts of learning. 'This Counſell, and this 'Helpe, are the pillar-like feet of every noble Theophilus, who treadeth the ſteppes of Chriſt, and 'walketh in his pathes; and ſuch a Theophilus may 'your Lordſhip be juſtly accounted; for, not only by 'Counſell as being one of the chiefeſt oracles of this 'land, but alſo by Helpe, as being one of the beſt 'nurſing Fathers of the Church, your honour ſeeketh 'the welfare of Zion, and the good of God's Temple. 'It is not I alone that ſay thus, but it is Muſarum 'Vox, the voice of the learned twins of this realme 'the two Univerſities, many of whoſe ſons had died 'and beene buried in their ſelles, had not your 'Honour called them forth, and ſent them into God's 'vineyard (73).'

[EE] Star-Chamber.] Mr. Hudſon, a barriſter of eminence, and a contemporary of Lord Chancellor Egerton's, in his manuſcript treatiſe on the Star-Chamber, continually refers to his Lordſhip in terms of high encomium and great veneration. That manuſcript is in the Britiſh Muſeum (Harl. Catal. 1226. Vol. I.) Sir William Blackſtone refers to it in the 4th volume of his Commentaries, page 267.

[FF] When Williams requeſted theſe four books.] Hacket thus deſcribes the Chancellor's donation of his papers to Williams. 'Well (ſaid the Chancellor), 'I know you are an expert workman: take theſe tools 'to work with, they are the beſt I have.' And he gave him ſome books and papers written with his own hand. Theſe were as valuable as the ſibylline prophecies. They were that Old Sage's collections for the well-ordering the High Court of Parliament, the Court of Chancery, the Star-Chamber, and the Council-board. An ineſtimable gift, being made over to the true heir apparent of his wiſdom. Let every one wear the garland he deſerves. For my part, I attribute ſo much to the Lord Egerton, that I believe the maſter's papers were the marrow of Mr. Williams, his prudence, and ſubtle judgment in all his negotiations. Theſe notes I have ſeen, but are loſt, as it is to be feared, in unlucky and devouring times (74).

The

The legacy was bequeathed him, 'and Williams made ſuch uſe of it,' ſays Fuller, 'that he tranſcribed theſe four books into his own brains: books,' adds he, 'that were (b) the four elements of our Engliſh ſtate, from which (i) he derived all that 'legal and political knowledge which qualified him for thoſe high and eminent ſtations 'he afterwards filled.' This appears from the King's declaration to his (k) Privy-Council on the 10th of July, 1621, when he gave the Great Seal to him, who, among other reaſons of his choice, mentions, as one, the great experience he had in Chancery buſineſs, under the Lord Elleſmere (l). Theſe books, which were principal inſtruments of his future fortunes, he ſo highly valued as to deem them a preſent fit to be offered to King James, to whom he gave them (m). In Lord Chancellor Egerton's life-time (n), was printed in quarto, in ſixteen ſheets, Lond. 1609, his "Speech in the "Exchequer-Chamber," in Robert Calvine's cauſe, ſon and heir-apparent of James Lord Calvine, of Colcroſs, in the Realm of Scotland, commonly called the caſe of the (o) Poſtnati. In the year 1641 was printed at London "The Priviledges and Preroga-"tives of the High Court of Chancery, written by the Right Honourable Thomas "Lord Elleſmere, late Lord Chancellor of England." In the year 1651 there was publiſhed at London a ſmall octavo book, entitled, "Certaine Obſervations concern-"ing the Office of Lord Chancellor," compoſed by the Right Honourable and moſt learned Thomas Lord Elleſmere, late Lord Chancellor of England, ſmall octavo, extracted chiefly from records. And Mr. George Paul publiſhed ſome papers found amongſt the manuſcripts of Mr. Laughton, of Cambridge, which were ſaid to have been written with the Lord Chancellor Egerton's own hand. Theſe were entitled, "The "Lord Chancellor Egerton's Obſervations on the Lord Coke's reports, particularly in "the Debate of Cauſes relating to the Right of the Church, the Power of the King's "Prerogative, the Juriſdiction of Courts, or the Intereſt of the Subject:" but, it is not generally agreed that theſe papers are truly aſcribed to Lord Chancellor Egerton.

His perſon, as to its exterior, was poſſeſſed of ſuch grave and ſtriking dignity, as to excite the curioſity of many to go to the Chancery in order to ſee and admire his venerable preſence; (and happy they, obſerves the facetious Fuller, who had no other buſineſs there (p);) and his interior preſented a ſubject of higher admiration [GG]. His apprehenſion was keen and ready, his judgment deep and ſound, his reaſon clear and comprehenſive, his method and elocution elegant and eaſy (q). As a lawyer, he was prudent in counſel, extenſive in information, juſt and honeſt in principle; ſo that, while he lived, he was excelled by none, and, when he died, he was lamented by all (r). As a ſtateſman, he was able, faithful, and ſincere, on all occaſions; and, as a judge, impartial and incorrupt. When he ſaw King James ſo profuſe to the Scots, in his honeſt and open zeal for the intereſt of the crown, he ſcrupled not frequently to admoniſh him, however he held it neceſſary that his Majeſty ſhould amply reward his countrymen, not to be too laviſh of the crown-lands, but to preſerve them for his own ſupport, ſince he or his ſucceſſors might meet with Parliaments which would not ſupply his occaſions but on ſuch conditions as he would not like (s). It was with him a common ſaying—Froſt and fraud both end in foul [HH] (t), a maxim his ſucceſſor, the great Bacon, might lament he had not weighed in time.

It contains a ſhort account of each caſe in the eleven volumes of Reports publiſhed by Lord Coke himſelf; and, probably, was a labour undergone by Lord Chancellor Egerton, as a preliminary to his obſervations on Lord Coke's Reports.—There is alſo, in Mr. Hargrave's collection of Law Manuſcripts, a piece with this title,—"Obſervations upon Lord "Coke's Reports, made by the Lord Chancellor "Egerton, taken by me out of his own papers, written "with his own hand." Lord Bacon has, in his apophthegms, recorded two of Lord Elleſmere's familiar obſervations, viz.

'They were wont to call referring to the Maſters 'in Chancery, Committing. My Lord Keeper Eger-'ton, when he was Maſter of the Rolls, was wont to 'aſk, what the cauſe had done that it ſhould be com-'mitted (76).'

(76) Bacon's Works, fol. Vol. III. p. 278.

'My Lord Chancellor Egerton, when he had read 'a petition, which he diſliked, would ſay; "What, 'you would have my hand to this now?" and the 'party anſwering, "Yes;" he would ſay farther, "Well, ſo you ſhall; nay, you ſhall have both my 'hands to it:" and ſo would, with both his hands, 'tear it in pieces.'

The tranſition from a great man's public to his private character is often diſadvantageous to him, and it is the opinion of many that, in the hiſtory of his life, it ought not to be made. In that, however, which is the ſubject of this article, it may be done with great advantage, as the private, will give a ſtill higher luſtre to the public, and prove that the heart of this virtuous ſtateſman was no way inferior to his head. To his friends, who were great and many, he was generous, beneficent, and condeſcending: to his enemies, who were few, he was merciful and forgiving; and the ſame ſpirit of benevolence and affection which diſtinguiſhed the whole of his public character, pervaded his more intimate and domeſtic connections, and diſplayed themſelves in every act of his private life.

So richly gifted with the beſt endowments both of heart and underſtanding, he devoted a long and laborious life to the ſervice of his King and Country, having filled all the higher departments of his profeſſion with an ability which ſeldom can be equalled, and with an integrity which can never be excelled. The fruit of all his honeſt and active labours he reaped in the favour and affection of his Prince, as well as the teſtimony and approbation of all good men, and in the more heartfelt ſatisfaction derived from the ſenſe of having faithfully diſcharged his duty. And, though uncommonly ſucceſsful in every occurrence of his life, and promoted through the merit of ſuperior parts and application to the higheſt honours, neither the inſolence of fortune, nor the ſplendour of theſe honours, could, in his enlarged and exalted mind, efface the ſentiments of the Chriſtian, nor deaden the feelings of the man. Fine ſenſibility, the inſeparable attendant on fine genius, cultivated by philoſophy and religion, was his privilege and ornament; and the pain which it neceſſarily and occaſionally experienced from the feelings and diſtreſſes of humanity, was abundantly repaid, and often heightened into enjoyment, by the exerciſe of a benevolent, and by the reflections of a Chriſtian and conſcientious, mind. His heart was full of faith, and his hope of immortality(u). "Cupio diſſolvi et eſſe cum Chriſto."

(u) See his own words in his firſt letter to James I. in this article. Alſo Cabala, p. 219.

Independently of the immediate object of biographical hiſtory, which is to diſplay the characters of men who have been eminent and uſeful, in order to teach the riſing generation how to emulate their virtues, and to ſhun their faults, the mind feels a complacency and enlargement in contemplating the lives of thoſe, who, by their learning, patriotiſm, or virtue, were the benefactors of mankind; and, though the General who conquered, or the Patriot who bled, in the public cauſe, is calculated to excite the more univerſal but tranſient admiration of the vulgar, the character we have now diſplayed will inſure the more valuable and permanent eſteem of the wiſe and good.]

 [ELLYS (ANTHONY), a learned Prelate of the Church of England, was born in the year 1693. Who his parents were, and what was the place of his birth, we are not informed. After having gone through a proper courſe of grammatical education, he was entered of Clare-Hall, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he took his Bachelor's Degree in 1712, and that of Maſter of Arts in 1716 (a). It is highly probable that he likewiſe became a Fellow of his College. Some time after, having taken holy Orders, he was promoted to the Vicarage of St. Olave, Jewry, and to the Rectory of St. Martin, Iremonger Lane, which is united to the former. This was in 1724; and, in 1725, he was preſented, by the Lord Chancellor Macclesfield, whoſe Chaplain he is ſaid to have been, to a Prebendal Stall in the Cathedral Church of Glouceſter. On the 25th of April, 1728, when King George the Second paid a viſit to the Univerſity of Cambridge, Mr. Ellys was created Doctor of Divinity, being one of thoſe who were named in the Chancellor's liſt upon that occaſion (b). In 1736, when the Proteſtant Diſſenters were engaged in endeavouring to obtain a repeal of the Corporation and Teſt Acts, Dr. Ellys appeared in oppoſition to that meaſure, and publiſhed a work, entituled, "A Plea for the Sacramental Teſt, as a juſt Security to the Church eſtabliſhed, and "very conducive to the Welfare of the State," quarto. This work has ſince been re-printed in our author's tracts, hereafter to be mentioned. It is an elaborate performance, written with great ability and learning; and is undoubtedly to be conſidered as one of the principal pieces on that ſide of the queſtion. In 1749, Dr. Ellys publiſhed a Sermon, which he preached before the Houſe of Commons on the thirtieth of January. This Diſcourſe, the text of which was, Matt. xxii. 21. was printed, as then was cuſtomary, at the requeſt of the Houſe (c). Our author's next publication was early in 1752, being "Remarks on an Eſſay concerning Miracles, publiſhed by David "Hume, Eſq. among his Philoſophical Eſſays," quarto. In this ſmall piece, which was written in a ſenſible and genteel manner, Dr. Ellys conſidered what Mr. Hume had advanced, relating to Miracles, in a ſomewhat different light from what had been done by Dr. Rutherforth and Mr. Adams. This Tract being anonymous, and coming after what Mr. Adams had ſo admirably written on the ſame ſubject, it did not, perhaps, excite that attention which it deſerved (d). In October, 1752, Dr. Ellys was promoted to the

See of St. David's, in the room of the Honourable Dr. Richard Trevor, tranſlated to the Biſhopric of Durham, and was conſecrated on the twenty-eighth of February, 1753 (e). It had for many years been underſtood, that our author was engaged in preparing, and had frequently declared his intention of publiſhing, a work, the deſign of which ſhould be to illuſtrate, confirm, and vindicate, the principles of religious liberty, and the reformation from Popery, founded upon them. This deſign recommended him to the notice of the excellent perſons at that time in adminiſtration, and particularly to Archbiſhop Herring; and it was the reputation of being employed in the accompliſhment of it, that occaſioned Dr. Ellys's advancement to the high ſtation which he held in the church. Why our Prelate never completed his deſign during his life-time, and why he received no farther marks of favour from the great perſonages who firſt countenanced him, appear to have been ſubjects of conjecture (f). Dr. Ellys, after his promotion to the Biſhopric of St. David's, continued to hold his prebend of Glouceſter, and his city living in commendam. The writer of this article, who lived for ſome time near him in Queen's-Square, Weſtminſter, well remembers how regularly the good Biſhop went every Sunday morning, in the Winter ſeaſon, to preach to his pariſhioners. Beſides his other preferments, he was vicar of Great Marlow, Bucks (g). In 1754, he publiſhed the Sermon which he had preached before the Houſe of Lords on the thirtieth of January. The text was, 1 Pet. ii. 16. In 1758, he was called to a ſimilar ſervice, before the ſame houſe, on the twenty-ninth of May, being the Anniverſary of King Charles the Second's Reſtoration (h). The laſt diſcourſe publiſhed by him was in 1759, having been delivered, from John xv. 8. before the Society for propagating the Goſpel in foreign parts (i). On the ſeventeenth of January, 1761, our Prelate died at Glouceſter, and was buried in the South aile of the Cathedral there, where a neat pyramidal monument is erected to his memory, with the following epitaph on a tablet of white marble, ſupported by a cherub:

The unfortunate marriage of Biſhop Ellys's daughter, after his deceaſe, and the ſubſequent derangement of her mind, would form a melancholy tale of domeſtic hiſtory.

The few publications of our author, which appeared in his life-time, were a ſufficient evidence of his general learning and abilities; but the grand proof of his talents was not diſplayed till after his death. In 1763, was publiſhed, in quarto, the firſt part of " Tracts on the Liberty, ſpiritual and temporal, of Proteſtants in England. Addreſſed " to J. N. Eſq. at Aix-la-Chapelle." The ſecond part was given to the world in 1765, under the title of " Tracts on the Liberty, ſpiritual and temporal, of Subjects in Eng- " land." Theſe two parts together form one great and elaborate work, which had been the principal object of the Biſhop's life. The greateſt part of the papers which were left by him, as we are informed by the editors, had been tranſcribed and fitted for the preſs; but the diffidence that often attends men of the moſt extenſive underſtanding, prevented him from coming to a reſolution of publiſhing them, though often ſolicited by his friends who had ſeen them, and by others of his acquaintance, who were ſo fully ſatisfied of his rare abilities, and knowledge of our civil and eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, as to believe no man of his time had better conſidered that ſubject, or was more capable of ſhewing it in a good light. The firſt volume, beſides the plea for the ſacramental teſt, conſiſts of ſeven tracts, the titles of which are as follow: " I. Of the Right of private Judgment in all Matters of Religion. II. Of the Liberty of publicly worſhipping God. III. On the Liberty, as to Matters eccleſiaſtical, when a Religion is publicly eſtabliſhed. IV. On the Liberty recovered to the People of England, by ſuppreſſing the Authority formerly exerciſed over this Realm by the Biſhop of Rome. V. An Anſwer to the Objections to the ill Uſe which, it is alleged, has been made of the Liberty we have gained, by having broken with the See of Rome. VI. The Nature of Supremacy, in Matters Eccleſiaſtical, veſted in the Crown. VII. The Claim of ſome Engliſh Proteſtants to greater Liberty than they now enjoy." Though Dr. Ellys, in theſe Tracts, vindicates the Eſtabliſhment of the Church from the objections of the Proteſtant Diſſenters, his principal concern is with the Church of Rome, the tenets of which he very particularly examines and confutes. Conſidering the turn of ſentiment, and the change in the courſe of reading which have ſince taken place, our author may, perhaps, be thought to have diſcuſſed the points in debate more minutely than would now be univerſally agreeable in the peruſal. But the ſubject was deemed highly important at the time in which he wrote. There was then an apprehenſion of danger from Popery; and this ſentiment he has expreſſed in his introduction to J. N. Eſq. "The increaſe," ſays he, "of the Romiſh intereſt in Europe has been ſo great for theſe laſt hundred "years, and is ſo likely to go farther, that it certainly is very neceſſary that the peo-"ple of this nation ſhould be acquainted at leaſt with the chief arguments againſt that "Religion. Of theſe, therefore, you will here find ſome account; not a large one "indeed, becauſe none but things of the greateſt moment have been ſelected; yet "ſuch a one as will, I hope, clearly ſhew that our anceſtors were indiſpenſably obliged "to leave the Communion of the Church of Rome, and that we are as ſtrictly bound to "continue that ſeparation as long as the terms of her communion remain what they are." The Pope of Rome does not, at preſent, ſeem likely to lift up his head; but, ſhould the controverſy between the Roman Catholics and the Church of England be revived, excellent materials for conducting it may be found in Biſhop Ellys's performance. Beſides, there can be no period in which a Proteſtant ſhould be a ſtranger to the grounds of his profeſſion, and in which it will not be extremely proper that literary men in general, and Divines in particular, ſhould have a good acquaintance with the ſubject.

The ſecond part of our Prelate's work is more likely to be a permanent object of attention. It comprehends ſix tracts, under the following titles. "I. Of the Liberty of the Subjects in Judicial Proceedings, as to Matters both Criminal and Civil. II. Of the Right and Manner of impoſing Taxes; and of the other Privileges of the Parliament. III. Of the Means whereby the free Conſtitutions of other Nations have been impaired, while that of England has been preſerved and improved. IV. Of the Antiquities of the Commons in Parliament. V. Of the Royal Prerogative, and the hereditary Right to the Crown of Britain. VI. Of the Dangers that may be incident to the preſent Eſtabliſhment, and the Proſpect there is of its Continuance." The ſecond, third, fifth, and ſixth, of theſe tracts are divided into ſections, containing various important and learned diſcuſſions. On the queſtion concerning the antiquities of the Commons in Parliament, our author's concluſion is as follows: "However, this in general is certain, "that, even from the Conqueſt till the time that the Commons were regularly ſum-"moned to Parliament, there were always lower kinds of men, as well as the greater "Barons, Members of Parliament. And, before the Conqueſt, during the Saxon "Conſtitution, the Commons had always a ſhare in the legiſlative authority (l)." The ſpecific character of Biſhop Ellys's work is, that it is a copious defence of moderate whiggiſm, joined with a zealous attachment to our eccleſiaſtical eſtabliſhment; and that it contains a large fund of hiſtorical, conſtitutional, and legal, knowledge (m). The language of the editors of the tracts, concerning our Prelate, and their judgment of his writings, ſhall be added to the preſent article. "He was not only eminent for his fine "parts, extenſive knowledge, and ſound judgment, jewels truly valuable in them-"ſelves, but they were ſet in him to the higheſt advantage, by a heart ſo overflowing "with benevolence and candour as never even to conceive terms of acrimony or re-"proach towards the opinions or perſons of thoſe who differed from him. This chriſ-"tian temper of his is diſcoverable in all the parts of theſe tracts that are taken up in "controverſy; for, he always thought a perſon, though on the right ſide of the queſ-"tion, with principles of perſecution, to be a worſe man than he that was on the "wrong. Theſe diſpoſitions engaged him in defence of toleration, and all thoſe in-"dulgences that he thought ought to be allowed to tender conſciences. But when that "liberty was once granted (as it was by law to our Diſſenters) he ſaw no neceſſity it "ſhould be attended with civil power, which might endanger the eccleſiaſtical eſta-"bliſhment; and, if he has ſhewed, beyond all doubt, the right of private judgment "in matters of Religion, and a liberty of publicly worſhipping God in conſequence of "that judgment, he has alſo as undeniably proved the neceſſity of a teſt, as a juſt "ſecurity to the eſtabliſhed Church, and a proper guard to the welfare of the State: "for he was perſuaded, that human laws cannot bind conſcience, but they may ex-"clude thoſe from civil power who profeſs a private conſcience repugnant to the public "conſcience of the State: all which he has managed with ſuch gentle, charitable, and "Chriſtian, liberty, as meant only to anſwer the argumen-s, not inflame the reſent-"ments, of the opponents (n)."]

 [ELSTOB

 [ELSTOB (WILLIAM), a Divine and Antiquary, was born at Newcaſtle upon Tyne, in the year 1673, and was the ſon of Mr. Ralph Elſtob, a merchant of that place. Being intended for the church, he received his grammatical education at Eton; after which, he was admitted of Catharine Hall, in Cambridge; but, the air of the country not agreeing with him, he removed to Queen's College, Oxford. Here his ſtudious turn acquired him ſo much reputation, that he was choſen Fellow of Univerſity College, and was appointed Joint Tutor with Dr. Clavering, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough (a). At this College Mr. Elſtob took the degree of Maſter of Arts, on the eighth of June, 1697 (b). In 1701, he tranſlated into Latin the Saxon Homily of Lupus, with notes, for Dr. Hickes. About the ſame time he tranſlated into Engliſh Sir John Cheke's Latin Verſion of Plutarch, "De Superſtitione." This tranſlation was printed at the end of Strype's Life of Cheke. The copy, made uſe of by Mr. Elſtob, was a manuſcript in Univerſity College, out of which Obadiah Walker, when Maſter of that College, had cut ſeveral leaves, containing Cheke's Remarks againſt Popery. In 1702, Mr. Elſtob was appointed Rector of the United Pariſhes of St. Swithin and St. Mary Bothaw, London, where he continued to his death. This appears to be the only Eccleſiaſtical preferment he ever obtained. In 1703, he publiſhed, at Oxford, an Edition of Aſcham's Latin Letters. He was the author, likewiſe, of an "Eſſay on the "great Affinity and mutual Agreement betwen the two Profeſſions of Law and "Divinity." It was printed at London, and the Preface to it was written by Dr. Hickes (c). This book, in proceſs of time, became ſo little known, that Mr. Philip Cartaret Webbe inſiſted upon it that there was no ſuch work. He was, however, convinced of the contrary, by an abſtract or view of it, which was ſent to Mr. Pegge, from a copy in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge. It is a thin octavo. Mr. Gough has a copy; and the book is not ſo very ſcarce as has commonly been apprehended (d). In 1704, Mr. Elſtob publiſhed two ſermons; one, a thankſgiving Sermon, from Pſalm ciii. 10, for the victory at Hockſtet; and, the other, from 1 Timothy i. 1, 2, on the Anniverſary of the Queen's Acceſſion (e). Beſides the works already mentioned, our author, who was a great proficient in the Latin tongue, compiled an Eſſay on its hiſtory and uſe; collected materials for an Account of Newcaſtle; and, alſo, the various proper names formerly uſed in the North: but what is become of theſe manuſcripts is not known (f). In 1709, he publiſhed, in the Saxon Language, with a Latin Tranſlation, the Homily on St. Gregory's Day (g). Mr. Elſtob had formed ſeveral literary deſigns, the execution of which was prevented by his death. This event took place in 1714, when he was only forty-one years of age. The moſt conſiderable of his deſigns was an edition of the Saxon Laws, with great additions, and a new Latin Verſion by Somner, together with notes of various learned men, and a Prefatory Hiſtory of the Origin and Progreſs of the Engliſh Laws, down to the Conqueror, and to Magna Charta. This great plan was completed, in 1721, by Dr. David Wilkins, who, in his Preface, thus ſpeaks concerning our author: "Hoc "Gulielmus Elſtob, in Literis Anglo-Saxonicis verſatiſſimus, præſtare inſtituerat. Hinc "Wheloci veſtigia premens, Leges quas Editio ejus exhibet, cum MSS. Cantabrigienſibus, "Bodleiano, Roffenſi, et Cottonianis contulerat, Verſioneque nova adornare propo- "ſuerat, ut ſic Leges, antea jam publici juris factæ, ejus Opera et Studio emendatiores "prodiiſſent. Verum Morte immatura præreptus, propoſitum exequi non potuit." Whilſt Mr. Elſtob was engaged in this deſign, Dr. Hickes recommended him to Mr. Harley, as a man whoſe modeſty had made him an obſcure perſon, and which would ever make him ſo, unleſs ſome kind patron of good learning ſhould bring him into light. The Doctor added his teſtimony to Mr. Elſtob's literature, his great diligence and application, and his capacity for the work he had undertaken. Mr. Harley ſo far attended to Dr. Hickes's recommendation as to grant to Mr. Elſtob the uſe of the books and manuſcripts in his library, which our author acknowledged in a very humble letter (h). It is ſaid, in the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, that a ſpecimen of Mr. Elſtob's deſign was actually printed at Oxford, in 1690 (i). This, if true, is a moſt extraordinary circumſtance; ſince our antiquary, at that time, could only be a little more than ſeventeen years of age. He intended, alſo, a Tranſlation with notes, of Alfred's Paraphraſtic Verſion of Oroſius; his Tranſcript of which, with Collations, is in Dr. Pegge's hands. Another Tranſcript, by Mr. Ballard, with a large Preface on the uſe of Anglo-Saxon Literature, was left by Dr. Charles Lyttelton, Biſhop of Carliſle, to the Library of the Society of Antiquaries. Alfred's Verſion of Oroſius has ſince been given to the public, with an Engliſh Tranſlation, by the Honourable Daines Barrington (k). In his publication, Mr. Barrington obſerves, that he has made uſe of Mr. Elſtob's Tranſcript, and that he has adopted from it the whimſical title of Hormeſta (l). When it is conſidered that Mr. Elſtob died in early life, it will be regretted, by the lovers of antiquarian learning, that he was prevented from acquiring that name and value in the literary world, to which he would otherwiſe probably have ariſen.]

 [ELSTOB (ELIZABETH), ſiſter of Mr. William Elſtob, and engaged in the ſame learned purſuits, was born at Newcaſtle in 1683. It is ſaid, that ſhe owed the rudiments of her extraordinary education to her mother; of which advantage, however, ſhe was ſoon deprived; for at the age of eight years ſhe had the misfortune of loſing this intelligent parent. Her guardians, who entertained different ſentiments, diſcouraged as much as they were able her progreſs in literature, as improper for her ſex (a). But their efforts were to no purpoſe; for ſhe had contracted too great a fondneſs for literary ſtudies to be diverted from the proſecution of them. During her brother's continuance at Oxford, ſhe appears to have reſided in that city, where ſhe was eſteemed and reſpected by Dr. Hudſon and other Oxonians (b). Upon her brother's removal to London, ſhe probably removed with him; and, it is certain, that ſhe aſſiſted him in his antiquarian undertakings. The firſt public proof which ſhe gave of it was in 1709, when, upon Mr. Elſtob's printing the Homily on St. Gregory's Day, ſhe accompanied it with an Engliſh Tranſlation. The preface, too, was written by her, in which ſhe anſwers the objections made to female learning, by producing that glory of her ſex, as ſhe calls her, Mrs. Anna Maria Schurman (c). Mrs. Elſtob's next publication was a Tranſlation of Madame Scudery's Eſſay on Glory. She aſſiſted, alſo, her brother in an edition of Gregory's paſtoral, which was probably intended to have included both the original and Saxon Verſion; and ſhe had tranſcribed all the hymns, from an ancient manuſcript in Saliſbury Cathedral (d). By the encouragement of Dr. Hickes, ſhe undertook a Saxon Homiliarum, with an Engliſh Tranſlation, notes, and various readings. To promote this deſign, Mr. Bowyer printed for her, in 1713, "Some Teſtimonies of "learned Men, in favour of the intended Edition of the Saxon Homilies, concerning "the Learning of the Author of thoſe Homilies, and the Advantages to be hoped for "from an Edition of them. In a Letter from the publiſher to a Doctor in Divinity." About the ſame time ſhe wrote three letters to the Lord Treaſurer, from which it appears, that he ſolicited and obtained for her Queen Anne's bounty towards printing the Homilies in queſtion (e). Her Majeſty's deceaſe ſoon deprived Mrs. Elſtob of this benefit; and ſhe was not otherwiſe ſufficiently patronized, ſo as to be able to complete the work. A few only of the Homilies were actually printed at Oxford, in folio. Mrs. Elſtob's Portraiture was given in the initial of "The Engliſh Saxon Homily, on the "Birth Day of St. George (f). In 1715, ſhe publiſhed a Saxon Grammar, the types for which had been cut at the expence of the Lord Chief Juſtice Parker, afterwards Earl of Macclesfield (g). Mrs. Elſtob had other literary deſigns in view, but was prevented from the proſecution of them, by her diſtreſſed circumſtances, and the want of due encouragement. After her brother's death, ſhe was ſo far reduced, that ſhe was obliged to retire to Eveſham in Worceſterſhire, where ſhe ſubſiſted with difficulty by keeping a ſmall ſchool. In this ſituation ſhe experienced the friendſhip of Mr. George Ballard, and of Mrs. Capon, wife of the Reverend Mr. Capon, who kept a boarding-ſchool at Stanton, in Glouceſterſhire. Theſe worthy perſons exerted themſelves among their acquaintance, to obtain for Mrs. Elſtob ſome annual proviſion. At length ſhe was recommended to Queen Caroline, who granted her a penſion of twenty guineas a year. This being determined by the Queen's deceaſe, Mrs. Elſtob was again brought into difficulties, and, though miſtreſs of eight languages, beſides her own, was obliged to ſeek for employment as a preceptreſs of children. She may, however, be conſidered as having been very fortunate in the ſituation which ſhe obtained in this capacity; for, in 1739, ſhe was taken into the family of the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland, where ſhe continued till her death, which happened on the thirtieth of May, 1756. She was buried at St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter (h). Mr. Rowe Mores deſcribes her as having been the indefeſſa comes of her brother's ſtudies, and a female ſtudent of the Univerſity; and as having originally poſſeſſed a genteel fortune, which, by purſuing too much the drug called learning, ſhe did not know how to manage. He adds, that upon viſiting her in her ſleeping-room at Bulſtrode, he found her ſurrounded with books and dirtineſs (i). If her friend Mr. Ballard had lived himſelf to have given a new edition of his "Memoirs of learned Britiſh Ladies," he would undoubtedly have added Mrs. Elſtob to the number. As to ourſelves, we have pleaſure in having paid this ſhort teſtimony of reſpect to the memory of a woman, whoſe literary attainments were of a nature ſo different from thoſe which have been commonly purſued by ſuch of her ſex as have appeared in the world under the character of Authors.] K.

ELSYNGE (HENRY), clerk of the Houſe of Commons in the reign of King Charles I. was born at Batterſea, in Surrey, in the year 1598, being the eldeſt ſon of Henry Elſynge, Eſq. (a) [A]. After a ſuitable education in Weſtminſter-ſchool, he was admitted in 1621 (b), into Chriſt's-Church-College, in Oxford; and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, June 22, 1625 (c). But, without taking any farther degrees, he went and travelled abroad; and ſpent, at ſeveral times, about ſeven years in foreign countries. By this he became ſo accompliſhed a gentleman, that his company and converſation were deſired by perſons of the higheſt quality and beſt judgment. He was in particular ſo highly valued by Archbiſhop Laud, that his Grace procured him the place of Clerk of the Houſe of Commons, to which he proved of infinite uſe, as well as a ſingular ornament (d). For he was the moſt excellent clerk, both to take and expreſs the ſenſe of the Houſe, that ever ſat there: and, alſo, ſo great a help to the Speaker, and to the Houſe, in ſtating the Queſtions, and drawing up the Orders free from exceptions, that it much conduced to the diſpatch of buſineſs, and the ſervice of the Parliament (e). His diſcretion alſo and prudence were ſuch, that, though the Long Parliament was by faction kept in continual diſorder, yet his fair and temperate carriage made him commended and eſteemed by all parties, how furious and oppoſite ſoever they were among themſelves. And therefore, for theſe his abilities and good conduct, more reverence was paid to his ſtool than to the Speaker Lenthall's chair, who, being obnoxious, timorous, and intereſted, was often much confuſed in collecting the ſenſe of the Houſe, and drawing the debates into a fair queſtion; in which Mr. Elſynge was always obſerved to be ſo ready and juſt, that generally the Houſe acquieſced in what he did of that nature (f). At length, when he ſaw that the greater part of the Houſe were impriſoned and ſecluded, and that the remainder would bring the King to a trial for his life; he deſired, on the 26th of December, 1648, to quit his place, by reaſon, as he alleged, of his bad ſtate of health: but moſt people underſtood his reaſon to be (and he acknowledged it to Mr. Whitelock and others of his friends) becauſe he would have no hand in the buſineſs againſt the King (g). After having quitted his advantageous employment, he retired to his houſe at Hounſlow, in Middleſex; where, contracting many infirmities of body, by his ſedentarineſs, ſome diſtreſſes in his family, and by a deep melancholy for the ſufferings and loſs of his Sovereign, he departed this life about the middle of Auguſt in the year 1654, and in the fifty-ſixth of his age. He was buried in his private chapel at Hounſlow, which is the burying-place of his family (h). He was a man of very great parts, and ingenuous education; was very learned, eſpecially in the Latin, French, and Italian languages; a great ſtudent, and a very juſt and honeſt man; one, in a word, of whom the great Mr. Selden was very fond (i). He was author of a few good things, of which we ſhall give an account in the note [B].

 [Without intending to detract in the leaſt from Mr. Elſynge's merit in his official capacity, it was perhaps going too far to aſſert, that he was the moſt excellent clerk, both to take and expreſs the ſenſe of the Houſe of Commons, that ever ſat there. Such unqualified aſſertions ſhould not lightly be ventured upon, becauſe the truth of them depends upon a compariſon which, perhaps, has never been accurately made. It is not our intention to introduce the language of flattery; but, we are informed, that living merit, in the office we are ſpeaking of, is very great. A new edition of Mr. Elſynge's Treatiſe of "The Manner of holding Parliaments in Eng-" land" was publiſhed in 1768, which had not only the advantage of being more correct than any preceding one, but was enriched with a large addition from the author's original manuſcript, preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum.] K.

ELYOT (Sir THOMAS), a Gentleman of eminent learning in the reign of King Henry VIII. and author of ſeveral works [A], was ſon of Sir Richard Elyot, of the county of Suffolk; and educated in academical learning at St. Mary's Hall in Oxford [B], where he made a conſiderable progreſs in logick and philoſophy (a). After ſome time ſpent at the univerſity, he travelled into foreign countries, and upon his return was introduced to the Court of King Henry, who, being a great patron of learned men, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and employed him in ſeveral embaſſies, particularly to Rome in 1532, about the affair of the divorce of Queen Catharine, and afterwards, about the year 1536, to the Emperor Charles V. (b). Sir Thomas was an excellent Grammarian, Poet, Rhetorician, Philoſopher, Phyſician, Coſmographer, and Hiſtorian; and no leſs diſtinguiſhed for his candour, and the innocence and integrity of his life (c). He was courted and celebrated by all the learned men of his time, particularly the famous antiquary Leland, who addreſſed a copy of Latin verſes to him [C]. A ſimilitude of manners, and ſameneſs of ſtudies, recommended him to the intimacy and friendſhip of Sir Thomas More (d). He died in 1546, and was buried, the 25th of March, in the church of Carleton, in Cambridgeſhire, of which county he had been Sheriff (e).

[B] Educated in academical learning at St. Mary's Hall in Oxford.] The year of his admiſſion, through the defect of the record, cannot eaſily be determined; unleſs it was about the year 1514: for, four years after, viz. in 1518, one Thomas Elyot was admitted ad lecturam alicujus libri facultatis Artium Logices Ariſtotelis, which is the admiſſion to the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in Lent the ſame year he completed that degree by determination in School-Street. It appears likewiſe, that the ſaid Thomas Elyot was, in the beginning of Auguſt, 1524, admitted ad lecturam alicujus libri inſtitutionum, that is, to the degree of Bachelor of the Civil Law. Now, if it could be made appear, that Sir Thomas Elyot died at about fifty years of age, we might certainly conclude him to be the ſame with Elyot the Bachelor of Arts and of the Civil Law; otherwiſe not (2).  [In Strype's Eccleſiaſtical Memorials are ſome farther particulars concerning Sir Thomas Elyot, which will make a proper addition to the preceding article. There was iſſued, in the year 1585, a proclamation for calling in ſeditious books: under which deſcription were reckoned, and chiefly intended, ſuch writings as favoured the Biſhop of Rome. Upon this occaſion Sir Thomas Cromwell directed letters to ſeveral perſons, ordering them to ſend in all publications of the nature deſigned to be condemned. Among others, he wrote to Sir Thomas Elyot, whom, though an old friend of his own, he ſuſpected, from his having been intimate with Sir Thomas More, to be attached to the Romiſh religion. In anſwer, Elyot declared his judgment of the need of a reformation of the clergy, and diſclaimed all undue connection with papiſts. As to any of the prohibited books he might chance to have by him, and which were very few, he was ready to deliver them up. Part of the language which he uſes is as follows: "Sir, As ye know, I "have been ever deſirous to read many books, eſpe-"cially concerning humanity and moral philoſophy. "And, therefore, of ſuch ſtudies I have a competent "number. But, concerning the Scripture I have "very few. For in Queſtioniſts I never delighted. "Unſavory gloſſes and comments I ever abhorred. "The boaſters and advancers of the pompous autho-"rity of the Biſhop of Rome I never eſteemed. But, "after that, by a judgment, or eſtimation of things, "I did anon ſmell out their corrupt affection, and "beheld

" beheld with ſcornful eyes the ſundry abuſions of " their authorities, adorned with a licentious and " diſſolute form of living. Of the which, as well in " them as in the univerſal ſtate of the clergy, I have " oftentimes wiſhed a neceſſary reformation (5)."

(5) Strype's Eccleſiaſtical Memorials, vol. I. p. 221, 222. Append. p. 153.

Sir Thomas Elyot's work, entitled, " The Go- " vernor" was deſigned to inſtruct men, eſpecially great men, in good morals, and to reprove their vices. It conſiſted of ſeveral chapters, treating concerning affability, benevolence, beneficence, the diverſity of flatterers, and other ſimilar ſubjects. In theſe chapters were ſome ſharp and quick ſentences, which offended many of the young men of faſhion at that time. They complained of Sir Thomas's ſtrange terms, as they called them; and ſaid that it was no little preſumption in him to meddle with perſons of the higher and nobler ranks. The complaints of theſe gentlemen, who were always kicking at ſuch examples as did bite them, our author compared to a galled horſe, abiding no plaſters. King Henry read and much liked Sir Thomas Elyot's Treatiſe; and was particularly pleaſed with his endeavours to improve and enrich the Engliſh language. It was obſerved by his Majeſty, that, throughout the book, there was no new term made by him of a Latin or French word, and that no ſentence was hereby rendered dark or hard to be underſtood.

Sir Thomas Elyot's Caſtle of Health ſubjected him to various ſtrictures. When ſome gallants had mocked at him for writing a book of medicine, and ſaid, in deriſion, that he was become a phyſician, he gave this anſwer: " Truly, if they call him a phyſician, which " is ſtudious about the weal of his country, I vouch- " ſafe they ſo name me. For, during my life, I will " in that affection always continue." Indeed, Sir Thomas's work expoſed him to the cenſures both of the gentry and the medical faculty. To the former, who alleged that it did not beſeem a Knight to write upon ſuch a ſubject, he replied, " that many Kings and " Emperors (whoſe names he ſets down) did not only " advance and honour that ſcience with ſpecial pri- " vileges, but were alſo ſtudious in it themſelves." He added, " that it was no more ſhame for a perſon " of quality to be the author of a book on the ſcience " of phyſick than it was for King Henry the Eighth " to publiſh a book on the ſcience of grammar, which " he had lately done." What offended the phyſicians was, that Sir Thomas ſhould meddle in their department, and particularly that he ſhould treat of medicine in Engliſh, to make the knowledge thereof common. But he juſtified himſelf by endeavouring to ſhew, that his work was intended for their benefit. As for thoſe who found fault with him for writing in Engliſh, he, on the other hand, blamed them for affecting to keep their art a ſecret. To ſuch of the college as reflected upon his ſkill he repreſented, that before he was twenty years old, one of the moſt learned phyſicians in England, read to him the works of Hippocrates, Galen, Oribaſius, Paulus Celius, Alexander Trallianus, Pliny, Diſcorides, and Joannicius. To theſe Sir Thomas afterwards added the ſtudy of Avicen, Averroes, and many more. Therefore, though he had never been at Montpelier, Padua, or Salerno; yet, he ſaid, " that he had found " ſomething in phyſick, by which he had experienced " no little profit for his own health."

On the whole, Sir Thomas Elyot was both one of the moſt learned, and one of the wiſeſt men of his time. Having, in the earlier part of his life, ſerved his King and Country in embaſſies and public affairs, he devoted his latter years to the writing of ſuch diſcourſes as he hoped would be ſerviceable in promoting true wiſdom and virtue. From his youth he had a great deſire after knowledge, and an earneſt ſolicitude to be uſeful to his countrymen. The books which he moſt diligently peruſed, and which he eagerly ſought after wherever they could be found, were all the ancient works, whether in Greek or Latin, that treated of moral philoſophy, and the right inſtitution of life. Strype has produced ſome examples of the wiſdom of our Knight in thoſe weighty ſentences which often came from his pen (6).

 [EMYLN (THOMAS), an eminent and learned divine among the Proteſtant Diſſenters, was born at Stamford in Lincolnſhire, on the twenty-ſeventh of May, 1663. His father, Silveſter Emlyn, who was a man of great plainneſs and honeſty, was poſſeſſed of a ſmall eſtate in that neighbourhood, which he kept in his own hands and management. His mother, whoſe Chriſtian name was Mildred, was the daughter of Mr. John Dering, near Chairing in Kent, a perſon of excellent parts and endowments; and ſhe herſelf, beſides being a woman of the ſtricteſt piety and virtue, had an enlargement of underſtanding, and a knowledge of books, far ſuperior to the generality of her ſex. Young Emlyn, who was their only ſon, was educated at Stamford till he was in his eleventh year, when he was put to a boarding-ſchool, under the care of Mr. Boheme, at Walcot, near Folkingham. Here he continued four years, and on Sundays was the conſtant auditor of the famous Mr. Richard Brockleſby, at that time Incumbent of the pariſh. Mr. Emlyn's parents were frequenters of the Eſtabliſhed Church, and particularly intimate with the learned and worthy Dr. Richard Cumberland, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough; but being inclined to the ſentiments of the Non-Conformiſts, they choſe to bring up their ſon to the Miniſtry among them, though the times afforded no encouraging proſpect to perſons of that denomination. For this purpoſe, in the year 1678, he was ſent for academical education to Mr. Shuttleworth, at Sulby, near Welford, in Northamptonſhire, where he ſtayed other four years. However, in 1679, he took a journey to Cambridge, and was admitted into Emanuel College, notwithſtanding which, he returned again to Shuttleworth. This private obſcure academy, in which there were but very few books, and thoſe chiefly of one kind, was by no means ſuited to Mr. Emlyn's taſte and inclination. He wiſhed to be placed where he could have ſuperior opportunities of gratifying his inquiſitive mind, and his eager thirſt for knowledge. Accordingly, in Auguſt, 1682, he removed to Mr. Doolittle's academy, which was kept firſt at Iſlington, then at Clapham, and afterwards at Batterſea. Here he was near the public ſcene, and had the opportunity of peruſing a variety of books, and of enjoying literary converſation. In conſequence of theſe advantages, united with the ſtrength of his own genius, he made much greater improvements than by the inſtructions of his tutor, who, though a very worthy and diligent divine, was not eminent for compaſs of knowledge, or depth of thought. He ſoon ſoared above the low leſſons of the ſeminary into which he had entered; nor could his enlarged mind ſubmit to be cramped by narrow ſchemes of ſyſtematical divinity; for he was early poſſeſſed with an opinion, that in religious matters he ought to judge for himſelf, and be tied down by no authority, where the arguments did not appear convincing, though no reaſon was with him ſtronger than this, "That God had ſaid it." His firſt eſſay as a preacher was on the nineteenth of December, 1682, at Mr. Doolittle's Meeting-houſe, near Cripplegate (a).

In the year 1683, Mr. Emlyn became Chaplain to the Counteſs of Donegal, a Lady of great quality and eſtate in the North of Ireland, but then living in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. While the family reſided there, he was the ſorrowful ſpectator of the tragical and affecting execution of the renowned patriot, Lord William Ruſſell. It was obſerved, by Mr. Emlyn, that even the guards themſelves diſcovered, in their melancholy and dejected countenances, their deep concern and grief at the fatal blow given to that noble Lord, and through him to the liberties of the nation. The next year (1684) Mr. Emlyn went over with the Counteſs and the reſt of her family to Belfaſt in Ireland, where ſhe was ſoon after married to Sir William Franklin, and lived in great ſtate and ſplendour. Here our Chaplain had a very liberal and handſome allowance, uſually wore the habit of a clergyman, and was treated by Sir William and the Counteſs with every mark of civility. Indeed they ſhewed to him the reſpect of an equal, and required their ſervants and attendants to behave to him with the ſame regard as to themſelves. He had too much good ſenſe to make an improper uſe of this encouragement. Sir William Franklin, who had a good eſtate in the Weſt of England, offered him a conſiderable living there; but this offer he declined, not being ſatisfied with the terms of miniſterial conformity, though at that time he had no ſcruples on the ſubject of the Trinity. He was far, however, from being ſtiff in trifles, or bigoted to any party. He conſtantly attended the ſervice of the Church both parts of the day; and when in the evening he preached in the Counteſs's Hall, he had the Miniſter of the pariſh (Mr. Claude Gilbert) for his auditor, with whom he lived in great intimacy, and for whom he often officiated in the pariſh-church. Indeed, without any ſubſcription, he had from the Biſhop of the dioceſe a licence to preach Facultatis exercendæ Gratiâ; inſomuch, that it was reported that he had entirely left the Diſſenters, and was gone over to the Eſtabliſhment. While Mr. Emlyn was in this ſtation, he made a journey to Dublin, where he preached once to the congregation of which Mr. Daniel Williams and Mr. Joſeph Boyſe were then paſtors; and ſo acceptable were his ſervices to the audience, that the people were hence afterwards induced to invite him thither. Towards the latter end of King James's reign, the North of Ireland was thrown into ſuch confuſion and diſorder, that the family of Sir William Franklin, and the Counteſs of Donegal, broke up; an event which was accelerated by ſome domeſtic differences. Mr. Emlyn, therefore, returned to London, where he arrived in December, 1688. Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Daniel Williams had ſome time before retreated to the ſame place, having quitted the paſtoral care of the congregation at Dublin, which he could never be perſuaded to reſume. When this determination was known, and Mr. Emlyn had not yet left Ireland, Mr. Boyſe ſounded him by letter, to know whether he was diſpoſed to become Mr. Williams's ſucceſſor, and wiſhed him to take Dublin in his way to England. He declined the propoſal. In Mr. Emlyn's journeyings between Ireland and London, he ſeveral times accepted of invitations to preach in the pariſh-churches of ſome towns through which he paſſed. At Liverpool in particular, as he was ſtanding at the door of his inn one Saturday evening, the Miniſter of the place, concluding by his garb that he was a clergyman, requeſted him to give his pariſhioners a ſermon the next day, which he accordingly did. What was very remarkable, when he paſſed that way again ſome time afterwards, the Miniſter being dead, ſeveral of the people, who had heard him before, deſired him to preach for them the next Sunday, which ſervice he performed ſo much to their ſatisfaction, that they offered to uſe their intereſt with their patron to procure him the living; an offer with which his views of things did not permit him to comply. After Mr. Emlyn had returned to London, being out of employment, he was invited by Sir Robert Rich, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, in May, 1689, to his houſe near Beccles, in Suffolk, and was by him prevailed upon to officiate as Miniſter to a diſſenting congregation at Leoſtoff in that county. This place he ſupplied for about a year and a half, but refuſed the invitation of becoming their paſtor, having determined not to accept the paſtoral care where he was not likely to ſettle for life, or at leaſt for a long continuance. Here alſo he cultivated a friendly correſpondence with the Pariſh-Miniſter, frequently taking ſeveral of his people along with him to church, and accompanying the ſaid Miniſter in collecting public charities; by which means a perfect harmony ſubſiſted between the Members of the Eſtabliſhment and the Diſſenters. During Mr. Emlyn's reſidence at Leoſtoff, he contracted a cloſe and intimate acquaintance with Mr. William Manning, a worthy Non-conformiſt Miniſter at Peaſenhall in that neighbourhood. Being both of them of an inquiſitive temper, they frequently conferred together, and jointly examined into the principal points of Religion, mutually communicating to each other their reſpective ſentiments. This correſpondence, notwithſtanding the great diſtance to which they were afterwards ſeparated, was carried on by letters as long as Mr. Manning lived. Dr. Sherlock's "Vindication of the Trinity," having been publiſhed about this time, their thoughts were very much turned to the conſideration of that ſubject; and, the more they enquired into it, the more did they ſee reaſon firſt to doubt of, and afterwards to differ from, the received doctrine in that article. Mr. Manning embraced the Socinian opinion, and ſtrove hard to bring Mr. Emlyn into the ſame way of thinking; but he could not be brought to doubt either of the preexiſtence of our Saviour as the Logos, or that by him God had created the material world. The interpretations which the Socinians gave of the Scriptures appeared to our divine ſo forced and unnatural, that he could by no means accede to them; nor did he ever, in the ſucceeding part of his life, change his ſentiments upon the ſubject. Nevertheleſs, upon occaſion of his carrying a letter from Mr. Whiſton to the Prolocutor of the lower Houſe of Convocation in 1711, he was, without any regard to truth, reflected on as a Socinian preacher (b).

(b) Ibid. p. vii—xiv.

When James the Second had fled from Ireland to France, and affairs were tending to a ſettlement in the former kingdom, the Proteſtant congregations began to reaſſemble in large numbers. Upon this occaſion, Mr. Boyſe again preſſed Mr. Emlyn to accept the paſtoral care, jointly with himſelf, of the Diſſenting Society, in Wood-ſtreet, Dublin. The invitation being earneſtly recommended by Mr. Nathanael Taylor, an eminent Miniſter in London, Mr. Emlyn thought proper to comply with it, after having taken a conſiderable time for deliberation. Accordingly, in May, 1691, he removed to Dublin. Here he ſoon came into great reputation as a preacher. He had not only a portly preſence, a ſtrong clear voice, and a graceful delivery, but his diſcourſes were for the moſt part rational and perſuaſive, and always accompanied with ſomething ſerious and pathetic. This he deemed the right mode of inſtruction, and often lamented that an addreſs to the affections was ſo much neglected by rational divines. Controverſial points he ſcarcely ever introduced into the pulpit. Few excelled him in prayer; and he was exemplary in the private duties which were incumbent upon him as a Chriſtian Miniſter. Mr. Emlyn being thus ſettled in Dublin, contracted an acquaintance there with Mrs. Eſther Bury, who, though an uſual attendant on the Church-ſervice, had been induced, by the fame of his preaching, to become his auditor. She was one of the daughters and coheireſſes of Mr. David Sollom, a gentleman of good eſtate in the county of Meath. At this time ſhe was the wife of Richard Cromleholme Bury, Eſq. who was poſſeſſed of a large eſtate near Limerick, and who, dying on the twenty-third of November, 1691, left her a widow, with a handſome jointure. In this ſtate, though ſhe had many admirers, Mrs. Bury continued till the year 1694, when ſhe was married to Mr. Emlyn. He was now arrived to the utmoſt height of his deſires. Being poſſeſſed of an eaſy fortune, he lived in affluence; beſides which he was in a ſtation of large and extenſive uſefulneſs, was highly beloved by his people, and was well reſpected by all who knew him. In 1697 he had ſome thoughts of openly declaring his ſentiments in relation to the Trinity, and of breaking off from the congregation: but, on mature deliberation, he determined not to proceed abruptly in ſo important an affair, nor haſtily to throw himſelf out of a ſtation of uſefulneſs. At the ſame time, he was reſolved to embrace the firſt fair occaſion of declaring his opinion concerning the Trinitarian doctrine. Till the year 1701, Mr. Emlyn continued in a moſt happy ſituation, both with regard to public and private life. But towards the end of that year he began to experience a very afflictive change in his condition. His firſt calamity was of a domeſtic nature; for, on the thirteenth of October, he loſt his wife, who was endeared to him by every conſideration. This event was ſucceeded, in a very few weeks, by the deceaſe of his mother; and he had a little before been deprived of a young ſon. The death of his wife, in particular, inflicted a deep and tender wound upon his heart, as may be perceived in the ſermon which he preached upon the occaſion; and, which was printed at Dublin, in 1703, under the title of "Funeral Conſolations." This Sermon exhibits one of the fineſt examples of unaffected pathetic eloquence that our language affords; and had nothing elſe ever been publiſhed by our author, it would have entitled him to high eſtimation among the readers of practical divinity. The excellence of the diſcourſe has occaſioned it to be ſeveral times re-printed. It is added to the volume of Sermons publiſhed after his deceaſe, and it is inſerted in the "Proteſtant Syſtem," and in the "Practical Preacher." Perhaps, it may be found in other collections. It is obſervable, that Mr. Emlyn never once mentions his wife, but, towards the concluſion of the diſcourſe, has covertly and delicately delineated her character. Afterwards it was a conſolation to him that his beloved conſort did not live to ſee the troubles which ſoon came upon him; ſince they might too deeply have affected her gentle ſpirit (c).

(c) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. xiv—xxii.

In leſs than nine months after Mrs. Emlyn's deceaſe, the perſecution of our author commenced on account of his opinions in relation to the Trinity. The firſt occaſion was given to it by Dr. Duncan Cummins, a noted phyſician in Dublin, and a leading member ber of the congregation in Wood-ſtreet. This gentleman had been brought up to the ſtudy of divinity, but afterwards choſe the medical profeſſion; and he had done ſo many kind offices to Mr. Emlyn, that his conduct could not be imputed to ill-will, but to a miſtaken zeal for what he apprehended to be important truth. Having obſerved that Mr. Emlyn avoided expreſſing the common opinion, and thoſe arguments which are ſuppoſed to ſupport it, he ſtrongly ſuſpected that his judgment was againſt the ſupreme deity of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. This ſuſpicion he communicated to Mr. Boyſe, the conſequence of which was, that, in June, 1702, they jointly waited upon Mr. Emlyn, acquainting him with their jealouſies, and earneſtly deſiring to know his real ſentiments in the matter. Being thus applied to, he thought himſelf bound, as a Chriſtian, to declare openly his faith in ſo great a point. Accordingly, he freely owned himſelf to be convinced, that the God and Father of Jeſus Chriſt is alone the Supreme Being, and ſuperior in Excellence and Authority to his Son, who derives all from Him. At the ſame time, Mr. Emlyn told the gentlemen that he did not aim to make any ſtrife among the people of the congregation, but was willing to leave them peaceably, that, if they pleaſed, they might chuſe another Miniſter. This, however, was not to be permitted him. Mr. Boyſe, not willing to take ſuch a weighty matter upon himſelf, brought it before the Dublin Miniſters, though he well knew the narrowneſs of their principles, and that ſome of them had reflected upon his own orthodoxy, having charged him with being a Pelagian. Theſe Miniſters were Mr. Weld, Mr. Travers, Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Iredel, and Mr. Tate. At an interview with them, he candidly explained his ſentiments, the only reſult of which was, that, on that very day, they agreed to caſt him off, and that he ſhould not be permitted to preach any more: and, this they did, without conſulting his congregation, who, as yet, were entire ſtrangers to the affair. Indeed, he had never any hearing before them at all. He directed, however, the Deacons and chief managers of the church to be called together, when he informed them, that a difference of opinion relative to the Trinity, had rendered him offenſive to ſome who were preſent, and to the Miniſters of Dublin; upon which account, thankfully acknowledging the kindneſs and reſpect they had ſhewn him for ſo many years, he deſired his diſmiſſion. At this information the gentlemen aſſembled were greatly ſurprized and grieved; and Dr. Cummins himſelf then wiſhed that he had not begun the buſineſs. It was propoſed that Mr. Emlyn ſhould lie by for ſome time without preaching; but to this he would not conſent without a declaration of the cauſe, leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected of having been guilty of ſome immorality. The next propoſition was, that he ſhould retire for a while to England, provided it was approved of by the Miniſters. To this they agreed, accompanying their agreement with an imperious meſſage, ſent by two of their number, charging him not to preach any where, to whatever place he went. Mr. Emlyn embarked for England the next day, with great inconvenience to himſelf and family; and, no ſooner was he gone, than a loud clamour was raiſed againſt him and his opinions. He had now leiſure to look back, and reflect on the change in his condition. He ſaw that he was entered upon a dark ſcene, and muſt arm himſelf for various trials. He had not been of ſo unſocial a nature as not to reliſh the ſociety and love of his dear friends, nor was he inſenſible to the pangs of a violent ſeparation. Neither was he yet ſo mortified to the world as not to feel the difference between contempt and reſpect, between affluence and ſtraits. Nevertheleſs, his convictions of what he believed to be truth were ſtill ſo clear, that theſe things never ſtaggered his reſolutions of adhering to it, in the midſt of all diſcouragements. When Mr. Emlyn came to London, he found ſome perſons who were diſpoſed to treat him with candour and charity. This, however, when they heard of it, was ſo offenſive to the Dublin Miniſters, that they endeavoured, by their letters, to render him as odious as poſſible. While he was in London, he publiſhed a ſhort account of his caſe (d).

(d) Narrative of the proceedings againſt Mr. Thomas Emlyn, p. 17—22. Appendix to ditto, p. 45—50.

After about ten weeks abſence, though Mr. Emlyn received diſcouraging accounts of the rage that prevailed againſt him in Dublin, he thought it neceſſary to return to his family. Finding that both his opinion and his perſon lay under a great odium among many who knew little of the ſubject in diſpute, he deemed it an act of juſtice to himſelf, and eſpecially to the truth, to ſhew what evidence there was in the Scriptures for the doctrine which he embraced. Accordingly, he wrote his "Humble Inquiry into the "Scripture-Account of Jeſus Chriſt: or, a ſhort Argument concerning his deity and glory, "according to the Goſpel [A]." A few days after this work was printed, our author intended tended to return England; but ſome zealous diſſenters, getting notice of his deſign, reſolved to have him proſecuted. Two of them, one of whom was a Preſbyterian, and the other a Baptiſt-church officer, were for preſenting Mr. Emlyn; but, upon reflection, this method was judged to be too ſlow, and too uncertain in its operation. Mr. Caleb Thomas, therefore, the látter of the two diſſenters, immediately obtained a ſpecial warrrant from the Lord Chief Juſtice (Sir Richard Pyne) to ſeize our author and his books. Thomas himſelf accompanied the Keeper of Newgate in the execution of the warrant, and was afterwards a very forward and eager witneſs at Mr. Emlyn's trial. Our author, with part of the impreſſion of his work, being thus ſeized, was carried before the Lord Chief Juſtice, who at firſt refuſed bail, but afterwards ſaid that it might be allowed, with the Attorney-General's conſent; which being obtained, two ſufficient perſons were bound in a recognizance of eight hundred pounds for Mr. Emlyn's appearance. This was in Hilary term, February, 1702-3, at the end of which he was bound over to Eaſter term, when the grand jury found the bill, wherein he was indicted of blaſphemy. To ſuch a charge he could not in juſtice ſubmit, and therefore choſe to traverſe. The indictment was altered three times before it was finally ſettled, which occaſioned the trial to be deferred till the fourteenth of June, 1703. On that day, Mr. Emlyn was informed, by an eminent gentleman of the long robe (e), that he would not be permitted to ſpeak freely, but that it was deſigned to run him down like a wolf, without law or game; and he was ſoon convinced that this was not a groundleſs aſſertion. The indictment was for writing and publiſhing a book, wherein he had blaſphemouſly and maliciouſly aſſerted, that Jeſus Chriſt was not equal to God the Father, to whom he was ſubject; and this with a ſeditious intention. For the amuſement of ſuch of our readers as are curious in their enquiries into the hiſtory of perſecution, a copy of the indictment ſhall be given below [B]. Mr. Emlyn knew that it would be difficult to convict him of being the author of the work; and, no queſtion being put to him on that head, he did not think himſelf bound, by a forward confeſſion, to be his own accuſer. The proſecutor, not being able to produce ſufficient evidence of the fact, at length ſent for Mr. Boyſe. This gentleman, being examined as to what Mr. Emlyn had preached of the matters contained in the book, acknowledged that he had ſaid nothing of them in the pulpit directly, but only ſome things that gave ground of ſuſpicion. Mr. Boyſe being farther aſked, what our author had ſaid in private conference with the miniſters, anſwered, "that what he had declared there was "judged by his brethren to be near to Arianiſm." Though this only proved the agreement of the book with Mr. Emlyn's ſentiment, it had a great effect upon the minds of the jury, and tended more than any other conſideration to produce a verdict againſt him. The Queen's counſel, ſenſible that they had only preſumption to allege, contended, that ſtrong preſumption was as good as evidence; which doctrine was ſeconded by the Lord Chief Juſtice, who repeated it to the jury. was was ſo violent, that our author's own counſel could not withſtand it. All this, however, related only to the fact of his writing the book, while the main queſtion ſtill remained, whether the paſſages produced in the indictment amounted to blaſphemy. But this matter was never ſpoken to at all. Mr. Emlyn's own counſel dared not to touch upon the ſubject, and he was not permitted to ſpeak for himſelf. In concluſion, the jury brought him in Guilty; for which ſome of them afterwards expreſſed their concern. The verdict being pronounced, the Attorney-General moved that our author might have the honour of the pillory; but the paſſing of the ſentence was deferred to June the ſixteenth, being the laſt day of the term. In the mean time Mr. Emlyn was committed to the common jail. During this interval, Mr. Boyſe ſhewed great concern for our author, and uſed all his intereſt to prevent the rigorous ſentence for which the Attorney-General (Robert Rochford, Eſq.) had moved. It being thought proper that Mr. Emlyn ſhould write to the Lord Chief Juſtice, he accordingly did ſo; and his letter was expreſſed in ſuch candid, ſerious, and manly, terms, that it ought to have excited a greater attention [C]. When he appeared to have judgment given againſt him, it was moved by one of the Queen's counſel (Mr. Brodrick) that he ſhould retract; but to this our author could not conſent. The Lord Chief Juſtice, therefore, proceeded to paſs ſentence on him; which was, that he ſhould ſuffer a year's impriſonment, pay a thouſand pounds fine to the Queen, and lie in priſon till paid; and that he ſhould find ſecurity for good behaviour during life. The pillory, he was told, was the puniſhment due; but, on account of his being a man of letters, it was not inflicted. Then, with a paper on his breaſt, he was led round the four Courts to be expoſed. This ſentence, for bare matters of ſpeculation and belief, was by ſome thought to be very ſevere and cruel; but the Lord Chief Juſtice did not ſcruple to magnify the mercy of it, becauſe in Spain and Portugal the puniſhment would have been no leſs than burning. After judgment had been paſſed, Mr. Emlyn was committed to the Sheriffs of Dublin, and was a cloſe priſoner, for ſomething more than a quarter of a year, in the houſe of the Under-Sheriff. On the ſixth of October, he was haſtily hurried away to the common jail, where he lay among the priſoners in a cloſe room, filled with ſix beds, for about five or ſix weeks; and then, by an habeas corpus, he was upon his petition removed into the Marſhalſea for his health. Having here greater conveniences, he wrote, in 1704, a tract, entituled, "General Remarks on Mr. Boyſe's Vindication of the true "Deity of our Bleſſed Saviour [D]." In the Marſhalſea our author remained till the twenty-firſt of July, 1705, during the whole of which time his former acquaintances were eſtranged from him, and all offices of friendſhip or civility in a manner ceaſed; eſpecially among perſons of a ſuperior rank. A few, indeed, of the plainer tradeſmen belonging to his late congregation were more compaſſionate and friendly. But, of all men, the diſſenting miniſters of Dublin were the moſt deſtitute of kindneſs. Not one

[C] That it ought to have excited a greater attention.] It was as follows;

'My Lord,

'Though your Lordſhip may perhaps judge me 'guilty of a fault that you cannot admit any apo- 'logy for, yet I may preſume upon ſo much com- 'paſſion as to have leave to offer ſomething by way 'of mitigation: I do aſſure your Lordſhip, that I 'have no greater deſire than to learn the truth from 'the holy Scriptures, by which I ſhall always be guided 'according to my beſt light; and, if I am miſtaken in 'my opinions, God knows, 'tis altogether unwillingly. 'It is moſt obvious that I have forfeited my intereſt, 'and ſacrificed my reputation in the world, and ex- 'poſed myſelf to ſuch evils as nothing could ever 'make me ſubmit to but the real fear of offending 'God; which your Lordſhip will, I doubt not, 'allow for a very great reaſon. I am ready to do any 'thing conſiſtent with my judgment and conſcience; 'but I am afraid to do that, for fear of ſhame from 'men, for which, my conſcience may ſuggeſt to me, 'that Jeſus Chriſt will be aſhamed of me at the great 'day. I imagine, by ſomething ſpoken on my trial, 'that your Lordſhip conceived I had written ſome 'deriding ſcornful expreſſions of the Holy Jeſus, 'which I am ſure I never deſigned; the ſum of the 'whole book being only to ſhew the Father to be 'greater than he, not denying him any glory con- 'ſiſtent with that. I hope, that as the great and 'merciful God will ſooner forgive many errors of the 'underſtanding than one wilful crime, ſo your 'Lordſhip will make a conſiderable difference between 'diſputable errors, which men of probity and learning 'are divided about, and ſcurrilous reflexions on the 'Bleſſed Jeſus, which are intended for contempt, 'which my ſoul ſhall ever abhor. I ſhall only pre- 'ſume to add, that as 'tis entirely for my conſcience 'that I ſuffer, ſo I can never be deprived of the com- 'fortable ſupport which ſuch a conſideration carries 'in it; having, I hope, learned in ſome meaſure, 'to be conformed to him who endured the croſs, 'and will ſhortly appear the righteous Judge of all. 'Knowing how much depends on your Lordſhip's 'favour, and clemency, as to the penalty I am liable 'to, I intreat for it, of them (Mr. Boyſe excepted) vouchſafed to Mr. Emlyn that ſmall office of humanity, the viſiting him in priſon; nor had they ſo much pity on the ſoul of their erring brother (as they thought him) as to ſeek to turn him from the error of his way. For a long time our author continued with little appearance of relief; content with this, that he knew for whom and for what he ſuffered. At length, through the zealous and repeated ſolicitations of Mr. Boyſe, the generous interference of Thomas Medlicote, Eſq. the humane interpoſition of the Duke of Ormond, and the favourable report of the Lord Chancellor (Sir Richard Cox, to whom a petition of Mr. Emlyn's had been referred), and whoſe report was, that ſuch exorbitant fines were againſt law, the fine was reduced to ſeventy pounds, and it was accordingly paid into her Majeſty's Exchequer. Twenty pounds more were paid, by way of compoſition, to Dr. Narciſſus March, Archbiſhop of Armagh, who, as Queen's Almoner, had a claim of one ſhilling a pound upon the whole fine. During Mr. Emlyn's confinement in the Marſhalſea, he regularly preached there. He had hired a pretty large room to himſelf; whither, on the Sundays, ſome of the impriſoned debtors reſorted; and from without doors there came ſeveral of the lower ſort of his former people and uſual hearers. That they would not wholly forſake him, nor refuſe to worſhip God with him, was a great pleaſure to our author in his ſtate of impriſonment (f).

'And am,

(f) Narrative, ubi ſupra, p. 23—44.

Soon after his releaſe Mr. Emlyn returned to London, where a ſmall congregation was found for him, conſiſting of a few friends, to whom he preached once every Sunday. This he did without ſalary or ſtipend; although, in conſequence of his wife's jointure having devolved to her children, his fortune was reduced to a narrow income. The liberty of preaching, which our author enjoyed, gave great offence to ſeveral perſons, and eſpecially to Mr. Charles Leſlie, the famous non-juror, and Mr. Francis Higgins, the noted rector of Balruddery, in the county of Dublin. Complaint was made upon the ſubject to Dr. Teniſon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. That great and good prelate was not unacquainted with Mr. Emlyn's having a meeting in London, or with what had befallen him in Dublin; but, he had heard ſuch an account of his character, that his Grace was not inclined to moleſt him. Even Mr. Higgins himſelf did not pretend to ſay, that our author made controverted points the ſubjects of his preaching. Nevertheleſs, in the repreſentation of the lower Houſe of Convocation to the Queen, in 1711, it was aſſerted, that weekly ſermons were preached in defence of the Unitarian principles. This aſſertion was ſo groundleſs, that Mr. Emlyn thought proper to write a paper containing ſome obſervations upon it. After a few years, his congregation was diſſolved by the death of the principal perſons who had attended upon his miniſtry, and he retired into a ſilent obſcurity (g), but not into idleneſs; for the greater part of his life was diligently ſpent in ſupporting, by various works, the principles he had embraced, and the cauſe for which he had ſuffered. The firſt performance publiſhed by him, after his releaſe from priſon, was, "A Letter to the Reverend "Dr. Willis, Dean of Lincoln; being ſome friendly Remarks on his Sermon before "the Honourable Houſe of Commons, November 5, 1705." The intention of this letter was to ſhew that the puniſhment even of Papiſts for religion was not warranted by the Jewiſh laws; and that Chriſtians had been more cruel perſecutors than Jews (h). In 1706, Mr. Emlyn gave to the world one of his moſt elaborate productions, which is, "A Vindication of the Worſhip of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, on Unitarian Principles. "In Anſwer to what is ſaid, on that Head, by Mr. Joſeph Boyſe, in his Vindication of "the Deity of Jeſus Chriſt. To which is annexed, An Anſwer to Dr. Waterland on "the ſame Head." That our theological readers may more diſtinctly perceive the ſpecific nature and object of this performance, we ſhall inſert the contents of it below [E].

Chap. I.

'Supreme divine worſhip of Jeſus Chriſt not required nor practiſed in Scripture. 1. Not in prayer. 2. Not in internal acts, as faith, love, &c. 3. Not in external acts, as baptiſm, Lord's ſupper. 4. Not to be inferred from the foundation on which thoſe acts of worſhip are grounded. II. An inferior religious worſhip of Jeſus Chriſt is allowed and required by the Scriptures. 1. In that He is worſhipped as Mediator. 2. In that He cannot be worſhipped through a Mediator. 3. In that his claim to worſhip is founded on ſubordinate derived dominion.

Chap. II.

'I. The paying inferior religious worſhip to Jeſus Chriſt does not intrench on the peculiar honour of God. 1. Not from the nature of the thing itſelf. 2. Not from Scripture teſtimony or example. II. The allowing inferior religious worſhip to Jeſus Chriſt will not clear Pagans or Papiſts from the charge of idolatry. For, 1. All idolatry is not founded on the nature of the act: nor, 2. Is it true that the Pagans did only give inferior or ſubordinate worſhip to their idols or dæmons.

Chap. III.

'I. The judgment and practice of the primitive fathers as to the point of worſhip. II. The concluſion, blaming the raſhneſs of ſome Trinitarian writers, and ſhewing the Unitarian principles of worſhip to be more ſafe.

'An anſwer to Dr. Waterland on the head of worſhip. Sect. I. From the common allowed practice of adoration or bowing the body to others beſides God. Sect. II. From the religious worſhip given to Jeſus Chriſt when on earth, and conſidered only as a ſacred prophet. Sect. III. From the religious worſhip due and allowed to the human nature of Jeſus Chriſt. Sect. IV. From the doctor's interpreting the imploring of grace and peace to be a religious invocation; and here of the imploring of grace from the ſeven ſpirits. Rev. i. 4. (i).

Two

Two publications came from our author in 1707, the first of which was entitled, "The Supreme Deity of God the Father demonstrated. In Answer to Dr. Sher-"lock's Arguments for the Supreme Divinity of Jesus Christ, or whatever can be "urged against the Supremacy of the First Person of the Holy Trinity." The other was, "A brief Vindication of the Bishop of Gloceſter's (Dr. Fowler) Discourses con-"cerning the Descent of the Man Christ Jesus from Heaven; from Dr. Sherlock the "Dean of St. Paul's Charge of Heresy. With a Confutation of his new Notion in his "late Book of The Scripture Proofs of our Saviour's Divinity." In 1708, Mr. Emlyn printed three Tracts, all of them directed against Mr. Leslie. The titles of them are as follow: "Remarks on Mr. Charles Leslie's first Dialogue on the Socinian Controversy. "A Vindication of the Remarks on Mr. Charles Leslie's first Dialogue on the Socinian "Controversy." "An Examination of Mr. Leslie's last Dialogue, relating to the "Satisfaction of Jesus Christ. Together with some Remarks on Dr. Stillingfleet's "True Reasons of Christ's Sufferings (i)." In this piece, the doctrine of Infinite Satisfaction is opposed with great ability. One of our Author's most curious productions was published by him in 1710. It is entituled, "The previous Question to the several "Questions about valid and invalid Baptism, Lay-Baptism, &c. considered, viz. "Whether there be any Necessity (upon the Principles of Mr. Wall's History of Infant "Baptism) for the continual Use of Baptism among the Posterity of baptized Chris-"tians." The contents of the work will be given in the note [F]. Though Mr. Emlyn has supported his hypothesis with ingenuity and learning, we do not find that he has obtained many converts to his opinion; though, perhaps, the number of them is at present rather increasing. Our Author did not again appear from the press till the year 1715, when he published, "A full Inquiry into the Original Authority of that "Text, 1 John v. 7. There are three that bear Record in Heaven, &c. Containing an "Account of Dr. Mill's Evidence, from Antiquity, for and against its being genuine. "With an Examination of his Judgment thereupon." This piece was addressed to Dr. William Wake, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, President, to the Bishops of the same province, his Grace's Suffragans, and to the Clergy of the lower House of Convocation, then assembled. The disputed text found an advocate in Mr. Martin; Pastor of the French Church, at the Hague, who published a Critical Dissertation on the subject, in opposition to Mr. Emlyn's "Inquiry." In 1718, our Author again considered the Question, in "An Answer to Mr. Martin's Critical Dissertation on 1 John v. 7. Shewing "the Insufficiency of his Proofs, and the Errors of his Suppositions; by which he "attempts to establish the Authority of that Text from supposed Manuscripts." Mr. Martin having published an Examination of this Answer, Mr. Emlyn printed a Reply to it in 1720 (k). A third Tract was written upon the subject by Mr. Martin; so that he had the honour of being left in the possession of the field; and this has been thought by many learned men, to have been the only honour he obtained. It is generally allowed that Mr. Emlyn shewed distinguished abilities and literature in the controversy, and that there were numerous converts to his opinion. Bishop Smallbrooke seems not to have been satisfied with Martin's defence (l). On Emlyn's side of the question are Father Simon, La Croze, Sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Bentley, Dr. Benson, Wetstein, Griesbach, and other respectable writers and critics. Indeed, such was the state of the controversy, that the learned in general had abandoned the defence of the verse (m), when a new and spirited advocate for its authenticity appeared in Mr. Archdeacon Travis. The Archdeacon's work, however, has not been permitted to be triumphant. Strictures have been made upon it by several authors, both at home and abroad; and Mr. Porson in particular (to whose eminence in Greek literature words cannot easily do justice) has examined Mr. Travis's positions with such ingenuity, ability, and critical precision, that, if the Archdeacon can produce an answer equally distinguished by the same qualities, he will justly be esteemed one of the most fortunate of mankind. In fact, the subject is considered, by many learned men, as for ever decided. Indeed, we have often been surprized, and this for two reasons, that so much stress should be laid upon the text in question by some zealous Trinitarians. In the first place, the words are capable of being explained of an Unity of Consent, and not of Substance; as is evident from similar language, in the seventeenth chapter of St. John's Gospel. And, secondly, in the proof of any important doctrine, the truth of it should be made to rest upon undisputed

paſſages, and not upon thoſe, the authenticity of which muſt at beſt be pronounced to be extremely doubtful. Such dubious paſſages can never have any effect upon the minds of thoſe who are previouſly ſceptical with regard to any great queſtion.

While Mr. Emlyn was engaged in this celebrated controverſy, he found leiſure for other publications. In 1718, he printed a tract entituled, "Dr. Bennet's New Theory "of the Trinity examined: or, ſome Conſiderations on the Diſcourſe of the ever bleſſed "Trinity in Unity; and his Examination of Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the "Trinity." Dr. Bennet's explication of the Trinity (as we have ſeen in his article (n)) was ſingular, and approached to Sabellianiſm; on which account he laid himſelf open to the ſtrictures both of Trinitarian and Unitarian Divines. Mr. Emlyn knew how to make the moſt of the Doctor's miſtakes. Three pieces were publiſhed by Mr. Emlyn in 1719. The firſt was, "Remarks on a Book, entituled, 'The Doctrine of the bleſſed "Trinity, ſtated and defended,' by four London Miniſters, Mr. Tong, Mr. Robinſon, "Mr. Smith, and Mr. Reynolds. With an Appendix, concerning the Equality of the "three Perſons, and Mr. Jurieu's Teſtimony to the primitive Doctrine on this point." Theſe four Diſſenting Clergymen, who had united their talents upon the ſubject, were not men of ſuch diſtinguiſhed abilities as to be reckoned among the moſt formidable antagoniſts with whom our author ever contended. His next publication was, "A true "Narrative of the Proceedings of the Diſſenting Miniſters of Dublin againſt Mr. Thomas Emlyn; and of his Proſecution (at ſome of the Diſſenters Inſtigation) in the "ſecular Court, and his Sufferings thereupon, for his humble, 'Inquiry into the "Scripture Account of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt:" Annis, 1702, 3, 4, 5. To which is "added an Appendix, containing the Author's own and the Dublin Miniſters Account "of the Difference between him and them, with ſome Remarks thereon." It has been thought that this narrative, which is now prefixed to Mr. Emlyn's works, has had a tendency to diſpoſe perſons, and young minds eſpecially, the more favourably to receive his ſentiments. Simple truth, indeed, ought to be the ſole point attended to in every controverſy; but it is in human nature to be ſometimes influenced by collateral conſiderations. The laſt tract publiſhed by our author, in 1719, was "The Reverend "Mr. Troſſe's Arguments anſwered; relating to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the Deity "of the Holy Ghoſt. Taken from his Catechiſm, and Sermon on Luke xxii. 31. "printed at Exon (o)."

It was a great ſatisfaction to Mr. Emlyn, to perceive that the doctrine, for which he had written and ſuffered ſo much, gradually gained ground both in England and Ireland. Nevertheleſs, he ſtill continued to be ſo obnoxious, that none of the Divines among the Diſſenters in London dared to aſk him to preach for them, excepting the Miniſters of the Baptiſt congregation at Barbican. Theſe gentlemen, who were Mr. Burroughs and Mr. (afterwards Dr.) James Foſter, to ſhew their catholic temper, and truly Chriſtian ſpirit, invited him more than once to that office; and, notwithſtanding the reflections of the cenſorious, were not aſhamed publicly to own him for a brother. About the year 1726, upon the deceaſe of the worthy and learned Mr. James Peirce, of Exeter, ſeveral of the people wiſhed to invite Mr. Emlyn thither, and had formed a deſign for that purpoſe. As ſoon, however, as he was acquainted with it, he requeſted them to deſiſt, thanking them for their reſpectful attention to him, and excuſing his acceptance of an invitation, on account of his declining years, and the feebleneſs of his limbs. Though our author lived in private retirement, he was honoured with the eſteem and friendſhip of divers perſons of diſtinguiſhed learning and in eminent ſtations. He was particularly intimate with the truly excellent Dr. Samuel Clarke. That great and good man, though at firſt he was ſhy and upon the reſerve with Mr. Emlyn, when he came to be farther acquainted with him, expreſſed a high value and regard for him, generally adviſed with him in matters of importance, and, notwithſtanding his uſual caution towards men, opened his mind to him with the utmoſt freedom. The Doctor's language to our author was, "I can ſay any thing to you (p)." Another of Mr. Emlyn's friends was Mr. Whiſton, who, in his account of his own life, has ſpoken of him ſeveral times in terms of great reſpect. In 1731, our author wrote "Obſervations on Dr. "Waterland's Notions in Relation to Polytheiſm, Ditheiſm, the Son's Conſubſtantiality "with and Inferiority to the Father;" and, in the ſame year, he drew up ſome "Memoirs of the Life and Sentiments of the Reverend Dr. Samuel Clarke." Theſe two tracts, we believe, were not given to the world till his works were collected together. They now form the concluding articles of the ſecond volume (q). Mr. Emlyn, who was naturally of a very chearful and lively temper, enjoyed, in all reſpects, a large ſhare of health, the gout excepted; which, by degrees, impaired his health, and by its annual returns greatly diſabled him in his limbs. For the laſt two or three years of his life he grew much feebler; and about a year before his death, he received a violent ſhock, which it was feared would have carried him off. However, he ſo well recovered from it that he weathered the next winter, though a ſevere one, without any farther breach upon his health. On Friday, the ſeventeenth of July, 1743, he was ſuddenly taken ill in the night, but grew ſo far better as to be able, for ſome days, to converſe converſe with his friends, and to teſtify the great ſatisfaction he enjoyed in the conſciouſneſs of his integrity. His diſorder returning, he departed this life on Tueſday, the thirtieth day of the month, in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age (r). On the ſixteenth of Auguſt following, his funeral ſermon was preached, at Barbican, by Mr. Foſter, who has given him an excellent and a juſt character (s). His character is, likewiſe, diſplayed at large in the memoirs of his life, which conclude it with aſſerting, that he was one of the brighteſt examples of ſubſtantial unaffected piety, of ſerious rational devotion, of a ſteady unſhaken integrity, and an undaunted chriſtian courage (t). He was buried in Bunhill-Fields, where there is an inſcription to his memory. His epitaph, as it was firſt deſigned in Latin, and as it was afterwards inſcribed on his tomb-ſtone in Engliſh, will be found below [G]. The Memoirs of his life were written by his ſon, Sollom Emlyn, Eſq. and ſeparately publiſhed in 1746. In the ſame year they were prefixed to a collection of his works, in two volumes, octavo. An appendix is added, containing ſeveral ſhort papers, drawn up by our author, on various ſubjects. Mr. Sollom Emlyn, who was bred to the law, and became an eminent Counſellor, was employed to publiſh Lord Chief Juſtice Hale's "Hiſtory of the Pleas of the Crown," which he did in 1736, in two volumes, folio, together with a preface and large notes. He died in the year 1756, and left one ſon, our worthy friend, the preſent Thomas Emlyn, Eſq. Barriſter at Law, a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and Fellow of the Royal Society.

Mr. Emlyn was one of the moſt eminent divines of the Arian perſuaſion which this country has produced. His works, which are written with great ability on that ſide of the queſtion, have made many converts, eſpecially among the Proteſtant Diſſenters. Though his writings are, perhaps, not now ſo much read as they formerly were, they ſtill continue to be held in reputation, and have a number of admirers. Our author was what is called a high Arian; believing our bleſſed Saviour to be the firſt of derived Beings, the Creator of the World, and an object of worſhip. We apprehend that ſeveral perſons, who are advocates for the pre-exiſtence of Chriſt, do not entirely coincide with the ſentiments which Mr. Emlyn has advanced upon theſe ſubjects.] K.

Which office he diſcharged during eleven years
With great faithfulneſs, diligence, and applauſe.
But, having maintained the Supreme unequalled Majeſty
Of the ONE GOD and FATHER of all,
He was, to the ſhame and reproach of a Chriſtian country,
Perſecuted even to bonds and impriſonment,
And the ſpoiling of his goods;
All which he endured with great patience and conſtancy,
With ſuch firmneſs and fortitude of mind,
As left no room to doubt his integrity,
And in his writings ſupported that important truth
With ſuch ſtrength of reaſon and argument
As left no room to make a reply.
At length, full of days and ripe for glory,
He departed this life in peace,

 [ERIGENA (JOHN SCOTUS), an eminent ſcholar of the middle age, was born in an early part of the ninth century. The moſt common account of him is, that he was a native of Air, in Scotland, though ſome writers have ſaid that the place of his birth was Ergene, on the borders of Wales, and others have contended that he was an Iriſhman (a). It is, we apprehend, moſt probable that he was a Scotſman. However this may have been, he was animated, in a very dark period, with a moſt uncommon deſire of literature. Seeing his country involved in great confuſion and ignorance, and that it afforded no means of acquiring the knowledge after which he thirſted, he travelled into foreign parts; and it is even aſſerted, by ſeveral authors, that he went to Athens, and ſpent ſome years in ſtudying the Greek, Chaldaic, and Arabic, languages (b). In whatever place he obtained his learning, it is certain that in philoſophy he he had no ſuperior, and in languages no equal, in the age during which he flouriſhed. Theſe extraordinary accompliſhments, together with his wit and pleaſantry, which rendered his converſation as agreeable as it was inſtructive, procured him an invitation from Charles the Bald, King of France, the greateſt patron of Literature in that period, to reſide with him. Of this invitation Erigena accepted, and lived a number of years in the Court of that Prince, on a footing of the moſt intimate acquaintance and familiarity. He ſlept often in the royal apartments, and dined daily at the royal table. From the following repartee, which is preſerved by one of our ancient hiſtorians, we may judge of the freedom which Scotus uſed with the monarch. As they were ſitting one day at table oppoſite to each other, after dinner, the philoſopher having ſaid ſomething that was not quite agreeable to the rules of politeneſs, the King, in a merry humour, aſked him, "Pray what is between a Scot and a ſot?" To which he anſwered, "Nothing but the table." Charles, ſays the hiſtorian, laughed heartily, and was not in the leaſt offended, as he made it a rule never to be angry with his maſter, as he always called Erigena. But the King valued this great man for his wiſdom and learning ſtill more than for his wit, and retained him about his perſon, not merely as an agreeable companion, but as his preceptor in the ſciences, and his beſt counſellor in the moſt arduous affairs of government. While Scotus reſided in the Court of France, he compoſed, at the deſire of his royal patron, a number of works, which procured him many admirers on the one hand, and many adverſaries on the other. The Clergy, in particular, were diſſatisfied with ſome of his notions, as not being perfectly orthodox (c). One of the ſubjects which employed his pen was the doctrine of Predeſtination. In his treatiſe on this ſubject, which was addreſſed to Hincmar, Archbiſhop of Rheims, and Pardulus, Biſhop of Laon, the poſition he begins with is, that every queſtion may be reſolved by four general rules of philoſophy, viz. diviſion, definition, demonſtration, and analyſis. By theſe rules he endeavours to prove, that there cannot be a double predeſtination, of one to glory, and another to damnation; and that predeſtination doth not impoſe any neceſſity, but that man is abſolutely free; and that, although he cannot do good without the grace of Jeſus Chriſt, yet he doth it, without being conſtrained or forced to do it by the will of God, by his own free choice. Sin, and the conſequences of it, and the puniſhments with which it is attended, are, ſays Erigena, mere privations, that are neither foreſeen nor predeſtinated by God; and predeſtination hath no place but in thoſe things which God hath pre-ordained in order to eternal happineſs; for, our predeſtination ariſeth from the foreſight of the good uſe of our free-will (d). Sentiments ſo bold, and delivered in ſuch an age, could not fail of exciting great indignation. Wemlo, or Ganelo, Archbiſhop of Sens, having read the work, collected out of it ſeveral propoſitions, which he arranged under nineteen heads, according to the number and order of the chapters of Scotus's treatiſe, and ſent them to Prudentius, Biſhop of Troyes. This prelate, having examined them, found in them, as he thought, not only the errors of Pelagius, but the impiety of the Collyridians. He employed himſelf, therefore, in anſwering Erigena; and another anſwer to him was written by Florus, a Deacon of the Church of Lyons. It does not appear that Scotus engaged any farther in the controverſy (e). Another of his works was upon the ſubject of the Euchariſt, in anſwer to a famous book of Paſchaſius Radbertus, concerning the body and blood of Chriſt. Upon this head, Erigena had the good ſenſe to oppoſe the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation (f).

While our author was employed in theſe diſcuſſions, an incident occurred, which drew upon him the diſpleaſure of the Roman Pontiff. Michael Balbus, the Greek Emperor, had ſent, in the year 824, a copy of the works of Dionyſius, the Philoſopher, to the Emperor Lewis the Pious, as a moſt acceptable preſent (g). In France theſe treatiſes were eſteemed to be an invaluable treaſure; and therefore Charles the Bald, who could not read Greek, was earneſtly deſirous of peruſing them in a Latin tranſlation. This deſire was undoubtedly increaſed by an opinion which at that time univerſally prevailed, though without any proof, that Dionyſius, the Areopagite, or St. Denys, was the firſt Chriſtian teacher, or Apoſtle, in France. At the requeſt of Charles, Joannes Scotus undertook the taſk of tranſlating the works in queſtion, the titles of which were, "On the Celeſtial Monarchy;" "On the Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy;" "On Divine Names;" and, "On Myſtic Theology." Theſe books were received with great eagerneſs by the Weſtern Churches; but the tranſlation having been made without the licence of the ſovereign Pontiff, and containing many things contrary to the received faith of the Church of Rome, the Pope, Nicholas the Firſt, was highly diſpleaſed, and wrote a threatening letter to the French King, requiring that Scotus ſhould be baniſhed from the Univerſity of Paris, and ſent to Rome. Charles had too much affection and reſpect for our author to obey the Pope's order; but Erigena thought it adviſable, for his ſafety, to retire from Paris. According to ſome writers, it was upon this occaſion that he returned to England. It was the tranſlation of the works of the pretended Dionyſius which revived the knowledge of Alexandrian Platoniſm in the

Weſt,

Weſt, and laid the foundation of the myſtical ſyſtem of Theology, which afterwards ſo generally prevailed. Hence it was, that philoſophical enthuſiaſm, born in the Eaſt, nouriſhed by Plato, educated in Alexandria, matured in Aſia, and adopted into the Greek Church, found its way, under the pretext and authority of an apoſtolic name, into the Weſtern Church, and there produced innumerable miſchiefs (b).

The moſt capital work of Scotus was his treatiſe "On the Diviſion of Nature, or the "Natures of Things;" which, after long lying in manuſcript, was publiſhed at Oxford, in 1681, by Dr. Thomas Gale. In various reſpects this was the moſt curious literary production of the age in which Erigena flouriſhed, being written with a metaphyſical ſubtlety and acuteneſs then unknown in Europe. This acuteneſs he acquired by reading the writings of the Greek philoſophers: and by applying the refinement of logic to the diſcuſſion of theological ſubjects, he became the father of that ſcholaſtic divinity, which made ſo diſtinguiſhed a figure in the middle ages, and ſo long reſiſted the progreſs of genuine ſcience. The remarks of one of our ancient hiſtorians (Hoveden) on Scotus's work are not unjuſt. "His book, entituled, 'The Diviſion of Nature,' "is of great uſe in ſolving many intricate and perplexing queſtions; if we can forgive "him for deviating from the path of the Latin philoſophers and divines, and purſuing "that of the Greeks. It was this that made him appear a Heretic to many; and it "muſt be confeſſed that there are many things in it which, at firſt ſight at leaſt, ſeem "to be contrary to the catholic faith." Of this kind are his opinions of God and the univerſe, which bear a conſiderable reſemblance to the pantheiſm of Spinoza (i). At the entrance of his work, Erigena divides nature into that which creates, and is not created; that which is created, and creates; that which is created and does not create; and that which neither creates nor is created. As a farther proof of the ſingularity of John Scotus's genius, we ſhall produce his argument for the eternity of the world. "Nothing can "be an accident with reſpect to God; conſequently, it was not an accident with reſpect to "him to frame the world: therefore God did not exiſt before he created the world; for, if "he had, it would have happened to him to create; that is, creation would have been "an accident of the divine nature. God therefore precedes the world, not in the order "of time, but of cauſality. The cauſe always was, and is, and will be; and therefore "the effect always has ſubſiſted, doth ſubſiſt, and will ſubſiſt; that is, the Univerſe is "eternal in its cauſe." Hence Erigena taught that God is all things, and that all things are God; by which he might only mean the ſame with the Oriental, Cabbaliſtic, and Alexandrian, Philoſophers; and, after theſe, with the followers of Origen, Syneſius, and the ſuppoſed Dionyſius, that all things have eternally proceeded by emanation from God, and will at length return into him as ſtreams to their ſource. Accordingly he ſays, that "after the Reſurrection nature itſelf will return to God; God will be all in "all, and there will remain nothing but God alone." From theſe brief ſpecimens it appears, that the philoſophy of Scotus was founded in the enthuſiaſtic notions of univerſal deification; and conſequently, that he is rather to be ranked among the fanatical than among the atheiſtical philoſophers. The monaſtic life, which then ſo generally prevailed, afforded ſo much leiſure for indulging the flights of imagination, and ſo many opportunities for an oſtentatious diſplay of piety, that it was peculiarly favourable to the propagations of Enthuſiaſm. To this it may be added, that the ignorance of the times made it perfectly eaſy for thoſe, who were inclined to practiſe upon vulgar credulity, to execute their deſign. It is not, therefore, ſurpriſing, that the dreams of myſticiſm ſhould be extenſively propagated, under the authority of a ſuppoſed apoſtolical name (k).

The concluding period of Erigena's life is involved in ſome degree of uncertainty. According to Cave and Tanner, he removed from France to England in 877, and was employed by King Alfred in the reſtoration of learning at the Univerſity of Oxford. It is ſaid, by Tanner, that, in 879, he was appointed Profeſſor of Mathematics and Aſtronomy in that Univerſity. Here he continued three years, when, upon account of ſome differences which aroſe among the gownſmen, he retired to the Abbey of Malmſbury, where he opened a ſchool. Behaving, however, with harſhneſs and ſeverity to his ſcholars, they were ſo irritated, that they are reported to have murdered him with the iron bodkins which were then uſed in writing. According to others, the ſcholars were inſtigated to this atrocious act by the Monks, who had conceived a hatred againſt Scotus, as well for his learning as his heterodoxy. The time of his death is differently ſtated, but is generally referred to the year 883. Some, however, place it either in 884 or 886 (l). Such is the ſtate of facts, as given by moſt of the Engliſh writers; but other authors ſuppoſe that our hiſtorians have confounded John Scotus Erigena with another John Scot, who was an Engliſhman, contemporary with Alfred, and who taught at Oxford. According to Mackenzie, Erigena retired to England in 864, and died there about the year 874. As a proof of the laſt circumſtance, he refers to a letter of Anaſtaſius, the Librarian to Charles the Bald, written in 875, which ſpeaks of

Scotus as of a dead man. Dr. Henry thinks it moſt probable that he ended his days in France (m). Anaſtaſius had ſo high an opinion of Erigena, that he aſcribed his tranſlation of the works of Dionyſius to the eſpecial influence of the Spirit of God. He was undoubtedly a very extraordinary man for the period in which he lived. During a long time he had a place in the liſt of the Saints of the Church of Rome; but at length, on account of its being diſcovered that he was heterodox with regard to the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, Baronius ſtruck his name out of the calendar. A catalogue of Scotus's works in general may be ſeen in Cave. Bale has added to the number, but probably without ſufficient reaſon (n)]. K.

ETHEREGE (GEORGE), a celebrated Wit in the reigns of King Charles and King James II, and eminent for his poetical genius, eſpecially in comedy. He is ſaid to have been deſcended of an antient family in Oxfordſhire [A], or allied to it (a), and born about the year 1636, but not very diſtant from London, it is believed, as ſome of his neareſt relations appear to have been ſettled not far from this metropolis, in the county of Middleſex. It is thought he had ſome education at the Univerſity of Cambridge, but it ſeems he travelled into France, and perhaps Flanders alſo, in his younger years; and, at his return, ſtudied, for a while, the Municipal Laws, at one of the Inns of Court in London (b). But the polite company he kept, and his own natural talents, inclining him rather to court the favour of the Muſes, and cultivate the "Belles Let-"tres," he purſued the ſame ſo effectually, that the town was obliged with his firſt dramatic performance in the year 1664 (c), intituled, "The Comical Revenge: or, "Love in a Tub [B];" the writing whereof brought him acquainted, as he has himſelf informed us, with Charles, afterwards Earl of Dorſet; to whom it is, by the author, dedicated. And the fame of this play, with his lively humour, engaging converſation, and refined taſte in the faſhionable gallantries of the town, ſoon eſtabliſhed him in the ſocieties, and rendered him the delight of thoſe leading Wits among the quality and gentry of chief rank and diſtinction, who made their pleaſure the chief buſineſs of their lives, in that reign; ſuch as George Villiers Duke of Bucks, John Wilmot Earl of Rocheſter, Sir Car. Scroop, Sir Charles Sidley, Henry Savile, &c. Encouraged hereby to proceed, he brought another comedy upon the Stage; but it was four years after, in the year 1668 (d), intituled "She would if ſhe could;" which alſo gained him no leſs applauſe [C]. And it was expected that he would, by the continuance of his ſtudies to poliſh

[A] An ancient family in Oxfordſhire.] Whereof, there was one, reſiding at Thame in that county, before the Reformation; whence ſprang the learned Dr. George Etherege, who was born there about the year 1520; educated at Chriſt-Church College, in the Univerſity of Oxford; was King's Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue there, in the reign of Queen Mary, and ſome part of Queen Elizabeth's; but then, as he had been an oppoſer of the Proteſtants, was obliged to reſign it; whereupon he followed his Profeſſion of Phyſick in the city of Oxon, and inſtructed ſeveral ſcholars, who were the ſons of ſome Roman Catholic gentlemen, in the Sciences, to his old age, being alive in 1588; and was buried in the ſaid city, when he died. He wrote and tranſlated many learned books in his younger years; as John Leland has, in his poetical Encomiums, remembered (1); being a good Hebrician, Grecian, and Poet; ſome of them written in divinity, phyſick, muſick, and verſe; among which was his Acta Henrici Octavi, in a Greek Poem, which he preſented to Queen Elizabeth, when, in a progreſs, ſhe viſited that Univerſity, Anno 1566. But, it being thought only deſigned for the uſe of her Majeſty and its author, it was during his life kept from the preſs, and ſo has continued ever ſince in MS. and ſub noctibus Atticis (2). He alſo tranſlated a book written by Paulus Ægineta into Engliſh; the Pſalms of David into Hebrew verſe; and moſt part, or all of Juſtin Martyr, from the original Greek; beſides ſome other things, for the particulars whereof we ſhall at preſent refer to our author (3).

[B] The Comical Revenge: or, Love in a Tub.] This Comedy was acted at his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York's Theatre, then newly erected in Lincoln's-Inn Fields; and firſt printed, as is obſerved above, in Quarto, 1664, again, in 1669, 1689, 1690; and afterwards in the volume of our Author's Comedies printed together. It is dedicated by him to the Honourable Charles Lord Buckhurſt; to whom he ſays, 'I could not have wiſhed myſelf more fortu-'nate than I have been in the ſucceſs of this poem: 'the writing of it was a means to make me known 'to your Lordſhip; the acting of it has loſt me no 'reputation; and the printing of it has now given 'me an opportunity to ſhew how much I honour you, '&c. (4).' Mr. Langbaine ſays that 'This Comedy, 'though of a mixed nature; part of it being ſerious, 'and writ in heroic verſe, yet has ſucceeded admira-'bly on the ſtage; it having been always acted with 'general approbation (5).'

[C] His Comedy, intitled She would if ſhe could, gained him no leſs applauſe.] This alſo, was acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, as was obſerved above, in 1668; again, in 1671, &c. Alſo acted at the Theatre-Royal by their Majeſties Servants, and printed, quarto, 1693, &c. And, though it has neither dedication, preface, prologue, nor epilogue, that might inform us of its ſucceſs, the reaſon whereof may perhaps preſently appear, yet has it had great encomiums alſo beſtowed upon it. One of our comic writers, who was his contemporary, and afterwards Poet Laureat, writes thus of this play, 'She would if 'ſhe could, I think, and have the authority of ſome of 'the beſt judges for it, is the beſt Comedy that has 'been written ſince the reformation of the ſtage. 'And even that, for the imperfect repreſentation of 'it at firſt, received ſuch prejudice, that had it not 'been for the favour of the Court, in all probability 'it had never got up again; and it ſuffers for it, in 'great meaſure, to this very day (6).' Mr. Phillips ſays of theſe two Comedies, Love in a Tub, and She would if ſhe could, that, for pleaſant wit and no bad œconomy, they are judged not unworthy the approbation they have met with (7). Gildon agrees with Langbaine, that this laſt is a Comedy of the firſt rank; and Langbaine farther wiſhes, 'For the public 'ſatisfaction, that this great maſter would oblige the 'world with more of his performances; which would 'put poliſh and enliven the theatrical taſte, be no leſs conſtant in ſuch entertainments than the moſt aſſiduous of his contemporaries. But it was aſcribed to his indolence, or too great an indulgence to his pleaſures, rather than any cloſe engagement, at that time, to more ſerious applications in the affairs of State, that there was an interval of above ſeven years between that and the appearance of his next, which was alſo his laſt dramatic production; and which, by the way, will ſhew us when that poem was written by his friend the Earl of Rocheſter, which we ſhall here below cite; wherein, though our author is highly complimented with all the requiſites of an accompliſhed poet, he is yet condemned to loſe the laurel for that delay [D]; his ſaid laſt comedy not being publiſhed till 1676. It is intituled, "The Man of Mode: or, Sir Fopling Flutter." It is dedicated by him to the Dutcheſs of York, who then was Mary, the daughter of the Duke of Modena; in the ſervice of which Dutcheſs, our author, as he ſays in his ſaid dedication, then was; and this play ſtill exalted his reputation, even above what both the former had done; he having therein, as perhaps he had alſo partly ſet himſelf ſome example in the others before, ſhadowed forth (but ſomewhat diſguiſedly) ſome of his noted acquaintance and contemporaries who were known, or thought to be ſo, by his ſaid draughts of them, to many of the audience, which rendered the play very popular [E]. It ſeems he was addicted to ſome great extravagances; being too free of his purſe

'put a ſtop to the crude and indigeſted plays, which, 'for want of better, cumber the ſtage (8).' Theſe applauſes aroſe from our Author's changing the ſtudy after old copies, and chimerical draughts from ungrounded ſpeculation, which is but painting with dead colours for thoſe taken directly from the freſheſt practice and experience in original life. He drew his characters from what they called the Beau monde; from the manners and modes then prevailing with the gay and voluptuous part of the world; which has made them appear the more natural, though we cannot ſay the more innocent. He has alſo ſpirited his dialogues, eſpecially in the courtſhip of the fair ſex, for which he is diſtinguiſhed, by Mr. Dryden and others, with a ſparkling gaiety which had but little appeared before upon the ſtage, in parts pretending to the character of modiſh gallants; and, to judge of his figures according to the rules of true ſemblance, he will appear a maſterly hand; but, ſtrictly to examine them by the rules of honour, morality, and the principles of virtue, where none ſuch are ſeriouſly profeſſed, as the main buſineſs in the Comedies of thoſe times and moſt ſince, are intrigues of unlawful love, would be a ſeverity that might tend to eclipſe that expoſure of thoſe corruptions which has ever been allowed as the greateſt benefit of theatrical repreſentations; according to the reflexions which have been made on the comic writings of our Author, and ſome other contemporaries, by a late writer (9): though it is by the ſame hand alſo owned, on the other ſide, that corruptions are too often taught upon the ſtage, under the pretence of expoſing them. To deſcribe and make known thoſe poiſonous things which are baneful to the body, may be neceſſary and ſufficient for the avoidance of the ignorant; but thoſe examples that poiſon the morals and virtues of the mind are ſo palatable to the vicious, that the ſimple or bare deſcriptions of them often prove fatal, unleſs accompanied with ſuch powerful antidotes as may deſtroy their miſchievous efficacy, or ſuch proſpects of their deſtructive conſequences as may terrify mankind more by their durable diſaſters than tempt them by their fleeting delights; as the ſame Author has alſo obſerved upon this topic (10): and this part of the argument has been alſo more directly applied to Sir George's plays, particularly by a late reformer of the ſtage, who had been a comic writer himſelf; and who, upon quoting a reflexion that had been made on a ſpeech in one of his own Comedies, as too much inclining to a vein of wantonneſs, may ſeem to have aimed at ſome apology for it, by recriminating upon this play of our Author's, as what is entirely written in that vein; where, ſpeaking of luſcious expreſſions and deſcriptions that gratify a ſenſual appetite, he ſays, 'This expedient to ſupply the deficiency of wit has 'been uſed more or leſs by moſt of the authors who 'have ſucceeded on the ſtage, though I know but one 'who has profeſſedly writ a play upon the baſis of 'the deſire of multiplying our ſpecies; and that is, 'the polite Sir George Etherege; if I underſtand what 'the lady would be at in the play called She would

'if ſhe could. Other poets have here and there given 'an intimation that there is this deſign under all the 'diſguiſes and affectations which a lady may put on; 'but no author, except this, has made ſure work of 'it, and put the imaginations of the audience upon 'this one purpoſe from the beginning to the end of 'this Comedy. It has always fared accordingly; 'for, whether it be, that all who go to this piece 'would if they could, or that the innocents go to it 'to gueſs only what She would if ſhe could, the play 'has always been well received (11).'

[D] Condemned to loſe the laurel for that delay.] In the ſaid famous poem, written by the Lord Rocheſter (*), after the example of Sir John Suckling's upon the like ſubject, Apollo finds ſome plauſible pretence of exception to the claim of every poetical candidate for the laurel crown; therefore our poet, by the ſcheme or drift of it, could eſcape no leſs diſappointment than the reſt; yet his Lordſhip, to do him ample juſtice, has ſufficiently ſhewed his merits to it, in every thing but his perſeverance to exert them; which, after having firſt of all diſcarded Mr. Dryden, he next expreſſes thus:

(*) Though it has ſince been fathered as well as ſome others, without any authority, upon George Duke of Buckingham. See The Trial of the Poets, for the Bays, in Imitation of a Satire in Boileau, among The Miſcellaneous Works of George late Duke of Buckingham, &c. 8vo. 1704, p. 41.

This reverend Author was no ſooner ſet by,
But Apollo had got gentle George in his eye;
And frankly confeſs'd, of all Men that writ,
There's none had more fancy, ſenſe, judgment, or wit:
But i'th' crying ſin idleneſs he was ſo harden'd,
That his long ſev'n years ſilence was not to be pardon'd.

Which plainly ſhews that the poem in which theſe lines are written (12) was juſt before the publication of our Author's next play above-mentioned in the text, and here in the following note.

[E] Which rendered the play very popular.] This Comedy called, "The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling "Flutter," acted alſo at the Duke's Theatre, beſides the firſt edition, above-mentioned, in 1676, had other impreſſions in 1684, &c. Our Author, in his courtly Dedication to the ſaid Dutcheſs of York has this, among other very complaiſant and reſpectful expreſſions: 'I hope the honour I have of belonging to you 'will excuſe my preſumption: 'tis the firſt thing I 'have produced in your ſervice, and my duty obliges 'me to what my choice durſt not elſe have aſpired.' The ſong in the laſt act was tranſlated by Sir Car Scroop, from part of an Elegy written in French by Madame la Comteſſe de la Suze (13). The Prologue was alſo written by the ſaid Baronet; in which he has theſe verſes:

(13) See Le Recueil des Pieces Gallantes, Tom. I. p. 42.

With modeſt fears a Muſe does firſt begin,
Like a young wench newly entic'd to ſin:
But, tickled once with praiſe, by her good will
The wanton fool would never more lie ſtill.
'Tis an old miſtreſs you'll meet here to night,
Whoſe charms you once have look'd on with delight;
But, now of late ſuch dirty drabs have known ye,
A Muſe o' th' better ſort's aſham'd to own ye, &c.

purſe in gaming, and of his conſtitution with women and wine; which embarraſſed his fortune, impaired his health, and brought ſome ſatirical reflexions upon him. Gildon ſays,

And he goes on to cenſure the ſuperfluous importation of any foreign characters of folly, when we are overſtocked with ſuch varieties as are giving continual provocation to be expoſed at home. Therefore he entreats the audience to be favourable to their own breed, and forbear to damn in the copy what they have admired in the original. The Epilogue to this play was written by Mr. Dryden; in which he found it proper to anticipate the audience with an opinion that there was no perſonal ſatire intended, and to prevent any thing of that kind being ſuſpected therein: ſo he deſcribes one of the principal characters, that of Sir Fopling, which was moſt liable to ſuch ſuſpicion, as a draught drawn only from the imagination, or its ideas ariſing from the collective body of fops in general, and pointing, by no means, at any particular man. To which purpoſe the former part of that Epilogue is thus written:

Moſt modern wits ſuch monſtrous Fools have ſhewn,
They ſeem not of Heav'ns making, but their own.
Thoſe nauſeous Harlequins in Farce may paſs,
But there goes more to a ſubſtantial aſs;
Something of man muſt be expos'd to view,
That, Gallants, they may more reſemble you:
Sir Fopling is a Fool, ſo nicely writ,
The ladies would miſtake him for a wit.
And, when he ſings, talks loud, and cocks, would cry,
I vow, methinks he's pretty company;
So briſk, ſo gay, ſo travell'd, ſo refin'd!
As he took pains to graff upon his kind.
True Fops help Nature's work, and go to ſchool,
To file, and finiſh God Almighty's Fool:
Yet none Sir Fopling him or him can call;
He's Knight o' th' Shire, and repreſents you all:
From each he meets, he culls what e'er he can,
Legion's his name—a People in a Man.

And to the ſame ſenſe concludes,

Yet every man is ſafe from what he fear'd,
For, no one Fool is hunted from the herd.

And yet he has here ſo deſcribed his dreſs, his airs, and humours, however gathered only from this chimerical precedent, as he would have it thought, on the drama, that the town was rather confirmed in, than diverted thereby from, applying the imaginary to a real perſon. And who was the original of this picture agreed upon at laſt to be, but Beau Hewit, the moſt notorious ſop of that time! as we have been credibly informed; alſo that the part of Dorimant was drawn for the Author's friend the Earl of Rocheſter; wherein his inconſtancy, falſehood, and triumphs, in the conqueſt and ruin of the fair, are varniſhed over with ſuch agreeable and captivating graces, of modiſh and polite gallantry, that they might have been no leſs delectable to the lighter, than diſpleaſing to the graver, part, or thoſe whoſe buſineſs it is to aſſume, or profeſs, this character. The Poet has alſo drawn out ſome ſketch of himſelf in this play, if we miſtake not, in the character of Medley: nay, as we alſo had it from the ſame intelligence, that of the late Mr. John Bowman, who had either acted the part of Sir Fopling, or ſome other, in this Comedy, when it was in its earlieſt and higheſt repute; the very Shoemaker, in the firſt act, was alſo meant for a real perſon, who, by his improvident courſes, having been before unable to make any profit of his trade, grew afterwards, upon this public repreſentation of him, ſo notable, and drew ſuch a reſort of the beſt cuſtomers to him, as obliged him to ſuch cloſe application in his buſineſs, and made him ſo ambitious of giving ſatisfaction, that he thenceforth became a very thriving man, and acquired a very ſubſtantial and comfortable maintenance for himſelf and family. The play met with extraordinary ſucceſs upon the ſtage, however different judgments have been given of it. Langbaine ſays, 'It is 'written with great art and judgment; and is ac-'knowledged by all to be as true Comedy, and the 'characters as well drawn to the life, as any play 'that has been acted ſince the Reſtauration of the 'Engliſh ſtage (14):' with whom Gildon agrees. 'Tis true, our Author has here in this, as well as his other Comedies before, made ſome witty alluſions and ſimilies drawn from the Sportſman's language, or phraſes uſed in the country diverſions of hunting and hawking, which might not be ſo familiarly reliſhed by ſome of his criticks, or meer courtiers, citizens, and cockneys in town: and though he may not have ſo highly built upon any little underplots, that keep up the ſpirit and buſineſs of the ſcenes, till they have gathered to one ſuch capital plot as might at laſt break out into that ſurpriſing diſcloſure of events which would anſwer the expectation of ſome judges; whence it was objected, that he had written two, as one Author, (*) or as another, not over correctly, three taking Plays without one Plot; though, it is by others aſſerted, theſe three plays are neither without plot or humour (15): Yet thoſe little objections, from ſome of his audience, were foundation enough, it ſeems, for a ſatirical pen to raiſe a little character of him upon, in that poem, where the ſaid ſatiriſt mentions our Author, among the better ſort of thoſe poets, who were then damned, as he acknowledges, only by the ignorant, after this manner:

A fourth, for writing ſuperfine,
With words correct in every line;
And one that does preſume to ſay,
A plot's too groſs for any play.
Comedy ſhould be clean and neat,
As gentlemen do talk and eat:
So, what he writes, is but tranſlation
From dog and partridge converſation (16).

But our Author has been handled, with regard particularly to this laſt Comedy, more ſeverely yet, by that critick in proſe, who, as we have above read, beſtowed ſome cenſure upon the laſt before-mentioned: but with what candour and equity, this has been ſo rigorouſly reflected on, is ſubmitted to other judges; by ſome of whom, it has been thought that, to ſift out ſome coarſe and indelicate ſentiments or expreſſions from the meaneſt or loweſt characters, and mention nothing that is gay, witty, or polite, from any others; nothing like what Dorimant has accoſted the widow with,

They taſte of death, who do at Heaven arrive,
But we this Paradiſe approach alive!

I ſay, to gather us out a few weeds only, and overlook every flower, has been thought in this inſtance but a partial deſcription of the Muſes garden; and ſome of our moſt celebrated comedies written ſince might ſuffer as much or more by ſuch inequitable examination. The part of Dorimant ſeems not ſo expreſsly intended for the perfect fine gentleman as the refined rake or libertine; the unconfinable rover after amorous adventures; therefore, ſtrict honour and honeſty are not to be expected in ſuch a character; and the play is unjuſtly brought to the teſt upon the falſe and unallowable propoſition of its being an abſolute pattern of genteel comedy. If all plays were to paſs the ordeal of moral virtue, it would have company enough in the fiery ſentence; and, under ſuch a mercileſs trial, it might not in ſome meaſure be denied, 'But that the negligence of every thing, which en-'gages the attention of the ſober and valuable part 'of mankind, appears very well drawn in this piece; 'as it muſt be denied, that it is neceſſary to the 'character of a fine gentleman, that he ſhould in 'that manner trample upon all order and decency.' And though we cannot be ſo very violently prejudiced as to aſſert that 'This whole celebrated piece is a 'perfect contradiction of good manners, good ſenſe, 'and common honeſty; that there is nothing in it 'but what is built upon the ruin of virtue and inno-'cence;' and, 'That nothing but being loſt to a ſenſe 'thereof can make any one ſee this comedy with-'out obſerving more frequent occaſions to move ſor-'row ſays, that for marrying a fortune he was knighted (e); but we have it more particularly in a poem of thoſe times, which never was printed, that, to make ſome reparation of his circumſtances, he courted a rich old widow; but her ambition was ſuch, that ſhe would not marry him unleſs he could make her a Lady; which he was forced by the purchaſe of knighthood to do (*). This might be, as it is computed, (from the chronological order in which that poem ſeems to have been tranſcribed, in the volume of ſuch like poems wherein we have ſeen it,) about the year 1683 (f). We hear not of any iſſue he had by this Lady: but we have been informed that he cohabited, whether before or after his ſaid marriage we know not, for ſome time with Mrs. Barry, the Actreſs, and had a daughter by her; that he ſettled five or ſix thouſand pounds upon her; but that ſhe died young (g). From the ſame intelligence we have alſo learnt, that Sir George was, in his perſon, a fair, ſlender, genteel, man; but ſpoiled his countenance with drinking and other habits of intemperance; and, in his deportment, very affable and courteous, of a ſprightly and generous temper; which, with his free, lively, and natural, vein of writing, acquired him the general character of Gentle George, and Eaſy Etherege; in reſpect to which qualities, we may often find him compared with Sir Charles Sidley [F]. His ſaid courtly addreſs, and other accompliſhments, won him the favour of the Dutcheſs aforeſaid; afterwards, when King James was crowned, his Queen; by whoſe intereſt and recommendation he was ſent Ambaſſador abroad. In a certain paſquil that was written upon him, it is intimated as if he was ſent upon ſome embaſſy to Turkey; which we ſhall here, in a note, tranſcribe [G], to ſhew how free the Wits could be with his character, who had been ſo with his own conduct. Gildon ſays, that, being in particular eſteem with the late Queen, King James's conſort, he was ſent Envoy to Hamburgh (b); but it is, in ſeveral books, evident, that he was, in that reign, a Miniſter at Ratiſbon; at leaſt, from the year 1686 to the time that his Majeſty left this kingdom, if not later; more eſpecially it appears that he was then there, in his own letters, which he wrote thence; ſome, to the Earl of Middleton, in verſe, to one whereof his Lordſhip engaged Mr. Dryden to return a poetical anſwer, in which he invites Sir George to write another play, and to keep him in countenance for his having been ſo dilatory in his laſt, reminds him how long the comedy, or farce, of "The Re-"hearſal" had been hatching, by the Duke of Buckingham, before it appeared (i); but we meet with nothing more of our author's writing, after his laſt comedy aforeſaid, for the Stage. However, there are in being ſome other letters of his in proſe, which were written alſo from Ratiſbon; two whereof, which he ſent to the ſaid Duke of Buckingham when he was in his receſs, becauſe they are not only entertaining in themſelves, but will give us a ſtronger and more exact reſemblance both of the writer and receiver than any draught that could be made with the moſt vivid colours in a moſt diſtant deſcription, may not, we perſuade ourſelves, be thought tedious here to produce [H]. 'row and indignation than mirth and laughter;' yet, we may partly coincide with the critick in the concluſion of his remarks on this play; where, at the ſame time that he allows it to be nature, we alſo agree, it is nature (though not in the utmoſt, yet) in its corruption and degeneracy (17). Theſe three comedies were reprinted together in the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, but ſo blindly, as to the time when they were written, having no particulars of any date but that of the year in which they were then reprinted, that there is no knowing, by any thing in the book, whether they were ever publiſhed before, or that the Author was not then alive (18); an imperfection, for want of ſome conſiderate editor, common in the new impreſſions of books, often to the perplexity, obſtruction, and miſguidance, of ſtudious men in their purſuits of hiſtorical knowledge. At the end of this edition, are the two poetical epiſtles of our author, which, in his embaſſy, he addreſſed to the Earl of Middleton; and three other ſmall poems, that will hereafter be ſomewhat farther ſpoken of (19).

> For Comical Revenge, the Lord thought fit
> To have a ſingle trial of his wit;
> In which the title, if well underſtood,
> Does ſhew, he wou'd write better if he cou'd:
> But he and's play have different miſhaps;
> One's purg'd to cure, t'other to get more claps.
> His meagre face did his bad fate foretel;
> That, like himſelf, 'twou'd not be count'nanc'd well:
> Inſtead of ſenſe, he welcomes you with ſound;

[H] May not be thought tedious here to produce.] We have met with but three letters of Sir George's writing in proſe from Ratiſbon. One is directed to his friend in London, whoſe name is not mentioned, and dated from that city, Auguſt 23, 1688; wherein, he

As for his other compoſitions, ſuch as have been printed, they conſiſt, for the greateſt part he gives a ſhort account of ſome German beauties there, &c. There is moreover ſomething arch in this letter; where Sir George is ſpeaking of an indolent friend 'whoſe miſtreſs, ſays he, I ſhould pity, but 'that I am perſuaded his prudence has made him 'chuſe her in the family:' and a little farther, he talks in the very ſame ſenſe of himſelf: 'I have 'learned to ogle and languiſh in publick, like any 'Walcup; and to content myſelf in private with 'a piece of houſehold-bread as well as ſome of my 'friends (23).' But the other two letters, which are more conſiderable for their contents, being thought worthy of revival, and proper to illuſtrate this article, we ſhall here recite; the firſt of them is as follows:

(23) See Familiar Letters by John Earl of Rocheſter, &c. Vol. II. 1697. Publiſhed by Ch. Gildon, and printed for Sam. Briſcoe; who, in an advertiſement before the ſame, ſays, that, in the next Trinity Term would be publiſhed a Third Volume of Familiar Letters: which would conſiſt entirely of the Lord Rocheſter's, the Duke of Buckingham's, and Sir George Etherege's: but we learn not that ſuch volume was ever publiſhed; though perhaps ſome of thoſe written by Sir George might afterwards be printed in other Collections.

To GEORGE Duke of BUCKINGHAM.

'My Lord,

'I RECEIVED the news of your Grace's retirement into Yorkſhire, and leading a ſedate contemplative life there, with no leſs aſtoniſhment than I ſhould hear of his Chriſtian Majeſty's turning Benedictine Monk, or the Pope's wearing a long perriwig, and ſetting up for a flaming beau in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age. We have a picture here in our Town-Hall, which I never look upon, but it makes me think on your Grace; and I dare ſwear you'll ſay, there is no diſhonour done you, when you hear whoſe it is: in ſhort, 'tis that of the famous Charles the Vth, who, amidſt all the magnificence that this fooliſh world affords, amidſt all his African laurels and Gallic triumphs, freely diveſted himſelf of the Empire of Europe, and his hereditary kingdoms, to paſs the remainder of his life in ſolitude and retirement.

'Is it poſſible that your Grace, who has ſeen ten times more luxury than that Emperor ever knew, converſed with finer women, kept politer company, poſſeſſed as much too of the true real greatneſs of the world as ever he enjoyed, ſhould in an age, ſtill capable of pleaſure, and under a fortune whoſe very ruins would make a comfortable Electorate here in Germany; is it poſſible, I ſay, that your Grace ſhould leave the play at the beginning of the fourth act, when all the ſpectators are in pain to know what will become of the hero, and what mighty matters he is reſerved for, that ſet out ſo advantageouſly at firſt? That a perſon of your exquiſite taſte, who has breathed the air of Courts even from your infancy, ſhould be content, in that part of your life which is moſt difficult to be pleaſed, and moſt eaſy to be diſguſted, to take up with the converſation of country parſons, a ſort of people whom to my knowledge your Grace never much admired; and do penance in the nauſeous company of lawyers, whom I am certain you abominate!

'To raiſe our aſtoniſhment higher, who could ever have propheſied, though he had a double gift of Noſtradamus's ſpirit, that the Duke of Buckingham, who never vouchſafed his embraces to any ordinary beauty, would ever condeſcend to ſigh and languiſh for the heireſs apparent of a thatched cottage, in a ſtraw hat, flannel petticoat, ſtocking of as groſs a thrum as the blue-coat boys caps at the hoſpital, and a ſmock (the Lord defend me from the wicked idea of it!) of as coarſe a canvaſs as ever ſerved an apprenticeſhip to a mackarel-boat? who could have believed, till matter of fact had confirmed the belief of it, (and your Grace knows that matter of fact is not to be diſputed,) that the moſt poliſhed refined epicure of the age, that had regaled himſelf in the moſt exquiſite wines of Italy, Greece, and Spain, would, in the laſt ſcene of his life, debauch his conſtitution in execrable Yorkſhire ale? and that he, who all his life-time had either ſeen Princes his play-fellows or companions, would ſubmit to the nonſenſical chat and barbarous language of farmers and higglers!

'This, I confeſs, ſo much ſhocks me that I cannot tell what to make on't; and, unleſs the news came to me confirmed from ſo many authentic hands, that I have no room left to ſuſpect the veracity of it, I ſhould ſtill look upon it to be apocryphal. Is your Grace then in earneſt, and really pleaſed with ſo prodigious an alteration of perſons and things? for my part, I believe it; for I am certain that your Grace can act any perſon better than that of a hypocrite.

'But I humbly beg your Grace's pardon for this familiarity I have taken with you. Give me leave therefore, if you pleaſe, to tell you ſomething of myſelf. I preſume that an account of what paſſes in this buſy part of the world will not come unacceptable to you, ſince all my correſpondents from England aſſure me, your Grace does me the honour to enquire often after me, and has expreſſed ſome ſort of a deſire to know how my new character fits upon me.

'Ten years ago, I as little thought that my ſtars deſigned to make a politician of me, and that it would come to my ſhare to debate in public aſſemblies, and regulate the affairs of Chriſtendom, as the Grand Signior dreamed of loſing Hungary: but my royal maſter having the charity to believe me maſter of ſome qualities, of which I never ſuſpected myſelf, I find that the zeal and alacrity I diſcover in myſelf, to ſupport a dignity which he has thought fit to confer upon me, has ſupplied all other defects, and given me a talent for which, till now, I juſtly fancied myſelf uncapable.

'I live in one of the fineſt and beſt mannered cities in Germany, where 'tis true we have not pleaſure in that perfection as we ſee it in London and Paris; yet, to make us amends, we enjoy a noble ſerene air, that makes us hungry as hawks; and though buſineſs, and even the worſt ſort of buſineſs, wicked politics, is the diſtinguiſhing commodity of the place, yet I will ſay that for the Germans, they manage it the beſt of any people in the world; they cut off and retrench all thoſe idle preliminaries and uſeleſs ceremonies that clog the wheels of it every where elſe: and I find, that, to this day, they make good the obſervation that Tacitus made of their anceſtors; I mean, that, their affairs, let them be ever ſo ſerious and preſſing, never put a ſtop to good eating and drinking, and that they debate their weightieſt negotiations over their cups.

'Tis true, they carry this humour by much too far for one of my complexion; for which reaſon I decline appearing among them but when my Maſter's concerns make it neceſſary for me to come to their aſſembles. They are, indeed, a free-hearted, open ſort of gentlemen that compoſe the Diet, without reſerve, affectation, and artifice; but they are ſuch unmerciful plyers of the bottle, ſo wholly given up to what our ſots call good-fellowſhip, that 'tis as great a conſtraint upon my nature to ſit out a night's entertainment with them as it would be to hear half a ſcore long-winded Preſbyterian Divines cant ſucceſſively one after another.

'To unboſome myſelf frankly and freely to your Grace, I always looked upon drunkenneſs to be an unpardonable crime in a young fellow, who, without any of theſe foreign helps, has fire enough in his veins to enable him to do juſtice to Cælia, whenever ſhe demands a tribute from him. In a middle-aged man, I conſider the bottle only as ſubſervient to the nobler pleaſure of love; and he, that would ſuffer himſelf to be ſo far infatuated by it, as to neglect the purſuit of a more agreeable game, I think deſerves no quarter from the ladies: in old age, indeed, when it is convenient very often to forget and ſteal from ourſelves, I am of opinion that a little drunkenneſs, diſcreetly uſed, may as well contribute to our health of body as tranquillity of ſoul.

'Thus I have given your Grace a ſhort ſyſtem of my morals and belief in theſe affairs. But the gentlemen of this country go upon a quite different ſcheme of pleaſure: the beſt furniture of their parlours, inſtead of innocent China, are tall overgrown rummers; and they take more care to enlarge their cellars than their patrimonial eſtates. In ſhort, drinking is the hereditary ſin of this country: and that hero of a Deputy here, that can demoliſh, at part, of little airy ſonnets, ſmart lampoons, and ſmooth panegyricks; which we ſhall only

‘ one ſitting, the reſt of his brother Envoys, is men‘ tioned with as much applauſe as the Duke of Lorrain,
‘ for his noble exploits againſt the Turks; and may ‘ claim a ſtatue, erected at the public expence, in ‘ any town in Germany.

‘ Judge then, my Lord, whether a perſon of my ‘ ſober principles, and one, that only uſes wine, as
‘ the wiſer ſort of Roman Catholics do images, to ‘ raiſe up my imagination to ſomething more exalted,
‘ and not to terminate my worſhip upon it, muſt not ‘ be reduced to very mortifying circumſtances in this ‘ place: where I cannot pretend to enjoy converſa-
‘ tion without practiſing that vice which directly ‘ ruins it.

‘ And as I have juſt reaſon to complain of the men,
‘ for laying ſo unreaſonable a tax upon pleaſure: ſo
‘ I have no leſs occaſion to complain of the women,
‘ for wholly denying it.

‘ Could a man find out the ſecret to take as long a ‘ leaſe for his life as Methuſelah, and the reſt of the ‘ Antediluvian gentlemen, who were three hundred ‘ years in growing up to the perfection of vigour, en‘ joyed it the ſame number of years, and were as long
‘ in decaying, ſomething might be ſaid for the two ‘ crying ſins of both ſexes here; I mean, drunken‘ neſs in the men, and reſerveneſs in the ladies.
‘ What would it ſignify to throw away a week's, nay,
‘ a month's, enjoyment upon one night's debauch, if ‘ a man could promiſe himſelf the age of a patri‘ arch? or where would be the mighty penance in ‘ dancing a dozen years attendance after a coy female;
‘ watching her moſt favourable moments, and moſt
‘ acceſſible intervals, at laſt to enjoy her, if infirmities
‘ and old age were to come ſo late upon us?

‘ But, ſince fate has given ſo ſhort a period to taſte
‘ pleaſure with ſatisfaction, three or four days ſick-
‘ neſs is too great a rent-charge upon human nature,
‘ and drunkenneſs cannot pretend, out of its own ‘ fund, to acquit the debt. And, my Lord, ſince our ‘ gaiety and vigor leave us ſo ſoon in the lurch;
‘ ſince feebleneſs attacks us, without giving us fair
‘ warning; and we no ſooner paſs the meridian of life
‘ but we begin to decline; it is hardly worth a lover's ‘ while to ſtay as long for compaſſing a miſtreſs as ‘ Jacob did for obtaining a wife; and, without this ‘ tedious drudgery and application, I can aſſure your ‘ Grace that an amour is not to be managed here.

‘ But, my Lord, I forget that, while I take upon me
‘ to play the moraliſt, and to enlarge ſo rhetorically
‘ upon the preciouſneſs of time, I have already made ‘ bold with too much of your Grace's: for which ‘ reaſon, I here put a ſtop to my diſcourſe, and will ‘ endeavour, the next pacquet that goes from this ‘ place, to entertain your Grace with ſomething more ‘ agreeable.

‘ I am,

‘ My Lord,

‘ Your Grace's moſt obedient Servant,

‘ G. ETHEREGE (24).’

Ratiſbon, Nov. 12, 1686.

(24) Miſcellaneous Works, written by G. late Duke of Buckingham, &c. 8vo. 1704, p. 124, &c.

Here, our reader has the moſt frank and undiſguiſed natural and lively images of Sir George's ſentiments upon the Duke's retirement from all the ſplendour and luxury of life; his own employment in his political capacity, with the habits and tempers of thoſe gentry of both ſexes, among whom he reſided; and, what is moſt directly to the purpoſe in this place, a more faithful and perſpicuous portrait of his own humour and genius than he could have been diſplayed by, in all the characters that were to be drawn of him. Now the reader is to judge, whether there is not a ſcene as diverting, a ſpirit as briſk, and a reſemblance of himſelf as clear, in the next,

To his Grace the Duke of BUCKINGHAM.

My Lord,

‘ I NEVER enjoy myſelf ſo much, as when I can ‘ ſteal a few moments from the hurry of public buſi-‘ neſs to write to my friends in England; and, as ‘ there are none there to whom I pay a profounder
‘ reſpect than to your Grace, wonder not if I afford ‘ myſelf the ſatisfaction of converſing with you by ‘ way of letters, the only relief I have left to ſupport
‘ your abſence at this diſtance, as often as I can find ‘ opportunity.

‘ You may gueſs by my laſt, whether I don't paſs
‘ my time very comfortably here; forced as I am, by ‘ my character, to ſpend the better part of my time
‘ in ſquabbling and deliberating, with perſons of beard
‘ and gravity, how to preſerve the balance of Chriſ‘ tendom; which would go well enough of itſelf, if
‘ the Divines and Miniſters of Princes would let it ‘ alone: and, when I come home ſpent and weary
‘ from the Diet, I have no Lord Dorſets or Sir Charles ‘ Sidleys to ſport away the evening with; no Madam
‘ I..... or Lady A.....s; in ſhort, none of thoſe
‘ kind charming creatures London affords, in whoſe ‘ embraces I might make myſelf amends for ſo many ‘ hours murdered in impertinent debates; ſo that, not
‘ to magnify my ſufferings to your Grace, they really ‘ want a greater ſtock of Chriſtian patience to ſupport
‘ time than I can pretend to be maſter of.

‘ I have been long enough in this town, one would ‘ think, to have made acquaintance enough with per-‘ ſons of both ſexes, ſo as never to be at a loſs how ‘ to paſs the few vacant hours I can allow myſelf: but ‘ the terrible drinking that accompanies all our viſits
‘ hinders me from converſing with the men, ſo often
‘ as I would otherwiſe do; and the German ladies
‘ are ſo intolerably reſerved and virtuous, with tears
‘ in my eyes I ſpeak it to your grace, that it is next
‘ to an impoſſibility to carry on an intrigue with them.
‘ A man has ſo many ſcruples to conquer, and ſo many ‘ difficulties to ſurmount, before he can promiſe him‘ ſelf the leaſt ſucceſs, that for my part I have given ‘ over all purſuits of this nature. Beſides, there is ſo ‘ univerſal a ſpirit of cenſoriouſneſs reigns in this ‘ town, that a man and a woman cannot be ſeen at ‘ Ombre or Picquet together, but 'tis immediately ‘ concluded ſome other game has been played be‘ tween them; and, as this renders all manner of ac‘ ceſs to the ladies almoſt impracticable, for fear of ‘ expoſing their reputation to the mercy of their ill-‘ natured neighbours, ſo it makes an innocent piece of ‘ gallantry often paſs for a criminal correſpondence.

‘ So that, to deal freely with your Grace, among ‘ ſo many noble and wealthy families as we have in ‘ this town, I can only pretend to be truly acquainted ‘ with one. The gentleman's name was Monſieur Hoff‘ man, a frank, hearty, jolly companion. His father,
‘ one of the moſt eminent wine-merchants of the city,
‘ left him a conſiderable fortune, which he improved
‘ by marrying a French jeweller's daughter of Lyons.
‘ To give you his character in ſhort, he was a ſen-
‘ ſible, ingenious man, and had none of his country
‘ vices; which I impute to his having travelled ‘ abroad, and ſeen Italy, France, and England. His ‘ lady is a moſt accompliſhed, ingenious perſon, and ‘ notwithſtanding ſhe is come into a place, where ſo
‘ much formality and ſtiffneſs are practiſed, keeps up
‘ all the vivacity, and air, and good humour, of France.

‘ I had been happy in my acquaintance with this ‘ family for ſome months; when an ill-favoured acci‘ dent robbed me of the greateſt happineſs I had hi‘ therto enjoyed in Germany, the loſs of which I can ‘ never ſufficiently regret. Monſieur Hoffman, about ‘ three weeks ago, going to make merry with ſome ‘ friends, at a village ſome three leagues from this ‘ place,

'place, upon the Danube, by the unskilfulness or 'negligence of the watermen, the boat, wherein he 'was, unfortunately chanced to overset; and, of some 'twenty persons, not one escaped to bring home the 'news, but a boy, who miraculously saved himself 'by holding fast to the rudder, and so by the rapidity 'of the current was cast upon the other shore.

'I was sensibly afflicted at the death of my worthy 'friend; and so indeed were all who had the honour 'of knowing him. But his wife took on so extrava-'gantly, that she, in a short time, was the only talk 'both of city and country. She refused to admit any 'visits from her nearest relations; her chamber, her 'antichamber, and pro-antichamber, were hung with 'black; nay, the very candles, her fans, and tea-'table wore the livery of grief: she refused all manner 'of sustenance, and was so averse to the thoughts of 'living, that she talked of nothing but death. In 'short, you may tell your ingenious friend Monsieur 'de Saint Evremond, that Petronius his Ephesian Ma-'tron, to whose story he has done so much justice in 'his noble translation, was only a type of our more 'obstinate as well as unhappy German widow.

'About a fortnight after this cruel loss, for I thought 'it would be labour lost to attack her grief in its first 'vehemence, I thought myself obliged, in point of 'honour and gratitude to the memory of my deceased 'friend, to make her a small visit, and condole her 'ladyship upon this unhappy occasion: and, though I 'had been told that she had refused to see several 'persons who had gone to wait on her with the same 'errand, yet I presumed so much upon the friend-'ship her late husband had always expressed for me, 'not to mention the particular civilities I had received 'from herself, as to think I should be admitted to 'have a sight of her. Accordingly I came to her 'house, sent up my name, and word was immediately 'brought me, that if I pleased I might go up to her.

'When I came into the room, I fancied myself 'in the territories of death; every thing looked so 'gloomy, so dismal, and so melancholy. There was 'a grave Lutheran minister with her, who omitted 'no arguments to bring her to a more composed and 'more Christian disposition of mind. "Madam," 'says he, "You don't consider, that, by abandoning 'yourself thus to despair, you actually rebel against 'Providence." "I can't help it," says she, "Providence 'may e'en thank itself for laying so insupportable a 'load upon me." "O fye, madam," cries the other, "this is downright impiety; what would you say 'now, if heaven should punish it by some exemplary 'visitation? "That is impossible," replies the lady, 'sighing, "and, since it has robbed me of the only 'delight I had in this world, the only favour it can 'do me is to level a thunderbolt at my head, and 'put an end to all my sufferings." The parson, find-'ing her in this extravagant strain, and seeing no 'likelihood of persuading her to come to a better 'temper, got up from his seat, and took his leave of 'her.

'It came to my turn now to try whether I was 'not capable of comforting her; and, being convinced 'by so late an instance, that arguments brought from 'religion were not likely to work any extraordinary 'effects upon her, I resolved to attack her ladyship 'in a more sensible part, and represent to her the 'great inconveniences, not which her soul but her 'body received from this inordinate sorrow.

"Madam," says I to her, "next to my concern for 'your worthy husband's untimely death, I am grieved 'to see what an alteration the bemoaning of his loss 'has occasioned in you." These words raising her 'curiosity to know what this alteration was, I thus con-'tinued my discourse. "By endeavouring, Madam, 'to extinguish, or at least to alleviate, your grief, than 'which nothing can be more prejudicial to a beautiful 'woman, I intend a public benefit; for, if the publick 'is interested, as most certainly it is, in the preserving 'of a beautiful face, that man does the publick no 'little service who contributes most to its preserva-'tion."

'This odd beginning operated so wonderfully upon 'her, that she desired me to "leave this general road 'of compliments, and explain myself more particularly 'to her." Upon this, delivering myself with an un-'usual air of gravity, which your Grace knows I 'seldom carry about me in the company of ladies, 'I told her that, "Grief ruins the finest faces sooner 'than any thing whatsoever;" and that, "as Envy 'herself could not deny her face to be the most 'charming in the universe, so, if she did not suffer 'herself to be comforted, she must soon expect to take 'her farewel of it." I confirmed this assertion by 'telling her of one of the finest women we ever had in 'England, who did herself more injury in a fortnight's 'time, by lamenting her only brother's death, than 'ten years could possibly have done; that I had heard 'an eminent Physician at Leyden say, that "Tears, 'having abundance of saline particles in them, not 'only spoiled the complexion, but hastened wrinkles. 'But, Madam," concluded I, "why should I give 'myself the trouble to confirm this by foreign in-'stances, and by the testimonies of our most knowing 'Doctors, when, alas! your own face so fully justi-'fies the truth of what I have said to you.

"How!" replied our disconsolate widow, with a 'sigh, that came from the bottom of her heart; "and 'is it possible that my just concern for my dear hus-'band has wrought so cruel an effect upon me in so 'short a time?" With that, she ordered her gentle-'woman to bring the looking glass to her, and, having 'surveyed herself a few minutes in it, she told me, "she was perfectly convinced that my notions were 'true. But," cries she, "what would you have us 'poor women do in these cases; for, something," 'continues she, "we owe to the memory of the 'deceased, and something, too, to the world, which 'expects at least the common appearance of grief 'from us."

"By your leave, Madam," says I, "all this is a 'mistake, and no better; you owe nothing to your 'husband, since he is dead, and knows nothing of 'your lamentation. Besides, could you shed an ocean 'of tears upon his hearse, it would not do him the 'least service: much less do you lie under any such 'obligation to the world as to spoil a good face only 'to comply with its tyrannic customs. No, Madam, 'take care to preserve your beauty, and then let the 'world say what it pleases; your ladyship may be 'revenged upon the world whenever you see fit." "I 'am resolved," answers she, "to be intirely governed 'by you; therefore, tell me frankly, what sort of a 'course you'd have me steer?" "Why Madam," says 'I, "in the first place forget the defunct; and, in 'order to bring that about, relieve nature, to which 'you have been so long unmerciful, with the most ex-'quisite meats and the most generous wines." "Upon condition you will sup with me," cries our 'afflicted lady, "I will submit to your prescription." 'But why should I trouble your Grace with a narra-'tion of every particular?

'In short, we had a noble regale that evening in 'her bedchamber; and our good widow pushed the 'glass so strenuously about, that her comforter, mean-'ing myself, could hardly find the way to his coach. 'To conclude this farce, which I am afraid begins 'now to be too tedious to your Grace, this phœnix 'of her sex, this pattern of conjugal fidelity, two 'mornings ago, was married to a smooth-chinn'd ensign 'of Count Trautmandorf's regiment; that had not a 'farthing in the world but his pay to depend upon! 'I assisted at the ceremony; though I little imagined 'the lady would take the matrimonial receipt so soon.

'I was the easier persuaded to give your Grace the 'larger account of this Tragi-comedy, not only be-'cause I wanted better matter to entertain you with 'at this lazy conjuncture, but also to shew your 'Grace that not only Ephesus, in antient, and Eng-'land in latter, times, have afforded such fantastical 'widows, but even Germany itself; where, if the 'ladies have not more virtue than those of their sex 'in other countries, yet, they pretend at least a 'greater management of the outside of it.

'By my last pacquet from England, among a heap 'of nauseous trash, I received the "Three Dukes of 'Dunstable," which is really so monstrous and in-'sipid only concisely enumerate at the foot of the page [I]. All that we have met with, more than is here mentioned or referred to of his writing in prose, is a short piece, inti-

'sipid that I am sorry Lapland or Livonia had not the 'honour of producing it: but, if I did penance in 'reading it, I rejoiced to hear that it was so solemnly 'interred to the tune of cat-calls. The "Squire of 'Alsatia," however, which came by the following 'post, made me some amends for the cursed impertinence of the "Three Dukes;" and my witty 'friend Sir C.... S...y's "Bellamira" gave me that 'intire satisfaction, that I cannot read it over too 'often.

'They tell me my old acquaintance Mr. Dryden 'has left off the theatre, and wholly applies himself 'to the study of the controversies between the two 'churches. Pray Heaven! this strange alteration in 'him portends nothing disastrous to the state; but I 'have all along observed, that Poets do religion as 'little service by drawing their pens for it, as the 'Divines do poetry, by pretending to versification.

'But I forget how troublesome I have been to your 'Grace. I shall therefore conclude with assuring that 'I am, and to the last moment of my life shall be, 'ambitious of being,

My Lord,

'Your Grace's most obedient,

'And most obliged servant,

'G. ETHEREGE (25).'

(25) Miscellaneous Works of George Duke of Buckingham, as before, p. 131. &c.

So this letter is dated, in the volume here referred to, whence the copy above is transcribed; but there seems to be a little mistake in it, and that the original was dated the year before: otherwise, it will appear to have been sent by our Author, to his noble friend, above a year after the said Duke was dead. Besides, 'tis likely he should have had Sir Charles Sidley's Comedy of "Bellamira" sent him sooner than two years after it was published; for, it was first printed in 1687; and, as Shadwell's "Squire of Alsatia" was first printed in 1688, it is most probable this letter was written in the same year, because Mr. Dryden had given over his Popish controversies upon the Revolution, and before the next year.

[I] Enumerate at the foot of the page] Of these his smaller poems we have met with about twenty that have been ascribed to him in print, besides the little sonnets that are interspersed in his plays; though, in the most particular account that has been given of him and his writings (26) there are not above half a dozen of them mentioned. One of the earliest, perhaps, of these his lesser poems, may be that "To her "Excellency the Marchioness of Newcastle, after the "reading of her incomparable Poems:" it consists of about forty lines, and begins thus, 'Madam, with so 'much wonder we are struck (27):' and because we have hitherto given but a very slender specimen of our Author's poetry, the conclusion of this panegyric may here serve for a farther taste of it:

(26) See Giles Jacob's Account of the Poets, in his article of Sir G. Etherege.

(27) One volume of her Ladyship's Poems, &c. was published in folio, 1653: another of her Letters and Poems, in 1676.

While we, your praise, endeav'ring to rehearse,
Pay that great duty in our humble verse;
Such as may justly move your anger, you,
Like Heav'n, forgive them, and accept them too.
But what we cannot, your brave Hero pays,
He builds those monuments we strive to raise;
Such as to after ages shall make known,
While he records your deathless fame, his own:
So, when an artist some rare beauty draws,
Both in our wonder share and our applause:
His skill, from time, secures the glorious dame;
And makes himself immortal in her fame.

Another of his panegyrical poems bears this title—"To Mr. I. N. on his Translations out of the French "and Italian;" beginning with, 'While others toil 'our country to supply,' &c. about a page and half. His translation of Voiture's "Urania," is in four stanzas of alternate verse, beginning thus—'Hopeless 'I languish out my days.' His song, "To Sylvia," is in three stanzas, or quadrains; concluding with, 'Who sees her must love, and who loves her must 'die:' by which it is still remembered among our sonneteers. Another song.—'Tell me no more you 'love,' &c. in sixteen lines. "To a very young "lady;" beginning, 'Sweet bud of beauty;' in fourteen lines. "To a Lady, who fled the Sight of "him."—'If I my Celia could persuade;' in eighteen lines. "To a Lady, asking him how long he could "love her."—'It is not, Celia, in our power;' in two stanzas of six. "The Divided Heart."—'Ah! 'Colin, that I were but sure:' near a page. "The "Imperfect Enjoyment."—'After a pretty amorous 'discourse:' fifty lines. "The forsaken Mistress:" 'a dialogue between Phillis and Strephon. 'Tell 'me, gentle Strephon, why:' about a page. Here are eleven of our author's poems, which are to be found in one volume (28). In another, entitled our Author's works, we find the last of them reprinted; and four besides, that are different, viz. A song of two stanzas on the inquietudes of love; beginning with, "Ye happy "Swains, whose Hearts are free." And another "Song "of Basset," in eight stanzas of alternate verse. Beginning—"Let Equipage and Dress despair (†)." We have also, in that volume called our Author's works, the two poetical letters sent by him from Ratisbon, as was before observed, to the Earl of Middleton; both written in verse of eight feet; the former containing nearly fourscore lines, the latter nearly forty; describing the dress and humours, of the ladies especially, in those parts, and how he passed his time amongst them; much in that airy and amorous vein wherein his letters in prose are written, before recited. Those five poems are in the volume before mentioned (29). And these two poetical letters are to be found likewise in two other collections at least; one in that which is styled "Familiar Letters," by the Lord Rochester, &c. before quoted (30), where we have also a poetical answer to the former of our Author's (31), though it is not mentioned in that collection by whom it was written; but, in another, the name of Mr. Dryden appears to it (32), who, in the beginning of his said answer, takes notice, that at the time of his writing the same, about 1687, Sir George was aged fifty-one years; whence may be computed the time of his birth, as it is above given. And, in the conclusion of that answer, Mr. Dryden intimates that Sir George had some while since begun another play, which he incites him to finish, as what could not fall below the "Rehearsal;" and as he knew no George, meaning our Author and the Duke of Buckingham, who could write any thing under ten years warning; as we have partly hinted already in the text above. There are, besides that answer, the two said poetical letters, in this same volume, and two songs more of his, not before mentioned. The one beginning with these words—'Cease, anxious world, 'your fruitless pain;' in three stanzas of six lines: and the other, with these—'In some kind dream 'upon her, Slumber, steal;' in fifteen lines (33). Lastly, there are three Poems more ascribed to our Author, in another volume, which we have also before quoted. One is entituled, "The Libertine:" beginning, 'Since Death on all lays his impartial 'hand;' consisting of three stanzas of eight lines, and a chorus (34). The others are, two Satires upon Nell Guyn, one of King Charles's mistresses. The first is called "Madam Nelly's Complaint:" beginning with—'If Sylla's ghost made bloody Cat'line 'start:' in about two leaves. The other is called "The Lady of Pleasure;" with its argument at the head of it, whereof the first line is, 'The life of 'Nelly truly shown,' in about three leaves and a page (35). These two satires, as we remember, were printed before, without any author's name: and, indeed, they seem to be written, the last especially, in a grosser style, with more blunt or vulgar expressions in it than was customary to Sir George: besides, as it mentions the death of Nell Gwyn, we believe it may therefore be found that it was written after that of our Author.

tuled, "An Account of the Rejoycing at the Diet of Ratiſbonne, performed by Sir "George Etherege, Knight, reſiding there from his Majeſty of Great Britain; upon "Occaſion of the Birth of the Prince of Wales. In a Letter from Himſelf." Printed in the Savoy, 1688 (k). How far beyond this, or the next year he lived, the writers on our Poets, who have ſpoken of him, have been, as in many other particulars of his life, ſo in the time when he died, very deficient. In Gildon's ſhort and imperfect account of him, which we have been forced to conſult in want of a better, it is ſaid, that after the Revolution he went for France to his Maſter, and died there, or very ſoon after his arrival thence in England (l). But there was a report, as we have received it from an ingenious gentleman, that Sir George came to an untimely death by an unlucky accident at Ratiſbon; for, after having treated ſome company with a liberal entertainment at his houſe there, in which having, perhaps, taken his glaſs too freely, and being, through his great complaiſance, too forward, in waiting on ſome of his gueſts at their departure, fluſhed as he was, he tumbled down the ſtairs and broke his neck, ſo fell a martyr to his civility (m). Some of his ſurviving relations, having received a credible account of it from a perſon who was acquainted with them, we ſhall ſuccinctly mention it, in the ſhort note hereunto ſubjoined [K].

(k) Printed in folio, on a half ſheet.

(m) This account we received from John Locker, Eſq.

[K] In the ſhort note hereunto ſubjoined.] Since the foregoing part of this article was printed off, we have been informed, that there are two wills in the Prerogative-office, which might poſſibly have given ſome farther light into the family, and other particulars relating to our Author, could we have had a timely extract of them. The firſt is executed by William Etherege, Anno, 1649 (36); the laſt, by another William Etherege, in Middleſex, Anno 1690 (37). Whether the former was the father of our Author, or any other relation, and the latter his brother we have not now time to examine. But, from thoſe who have been converſant with ſome ſurvivors of the family, we have received intelligence, that our Author, Sir George, had a brother, who lived and died at Weſtminſter; had been a great courtier, yet a man of ſuch ſtrict honour, that he was eſteemed a reputation to the family. His picture, painted in a gown, with his fine black curled hair, is in the poſſeſſion of a friend. He had been twice married, and, by his firſt wife, had a ſon; a little man, of a brave ſpirit, who inherited the honourable principles of his father. He was a Colonel in King William's wars; was near him in one of the moſt dangerous battles in Flanders, I think it was the battle of Landen, in 1693, when his Majeſty was wounded, and the Colonel both loſt his right eye, and received ſuch a contuſion on his ſide as he complained of to his death. He was offered, in Queen Anne's reign, twenty-two hundred pounds for his commiſſion, but refuſed to live at home in peace, when his country was at war. This Colonel Etherege died at Eling in Middleſex, about the third or fourth year of King George the Firſt; when his dear friend, the Lord Rivers, had his body opened; and there was found a gathering where he had received his bruiſe, which looked like a ſodden turnip, and probably haſtened his death. He was buried in Kenſington church, near the altar; and there is a tombſtone over his vault, in which were alſo buried his wife, ſon, and ſiſter: That ſon was graciouſly received at Court by Queen Anne; and, ſoon after his father returned from the wars in Flanders, under the Duke of Marlborough, ſhe gave him an Enſign's commiſſion, intending farther to promote him, in reward of his father's ſervice; but he died a youth: and that ſiſter married Mr. Hill of Feverſham in Kent; but we hear not of any male iſſue ſurviving.  [The Editors of the Biographica Dramatica obſerve, that, as a writer, Sir George Etherege was certainly born a poet, and appears to have been poſſeſſed of a genius, the vivacity of which, needed no cultivation; for, there are no proofs of his having been a ſcholar (38). Though the "Comical Revenge" ſucceeded very well upon the ſtage, and met with general approbation for a conſiderable time, it is now juſtly laid aſide on account of its immorality. This is the caſe, likewiſe, with regard to Sir George's other plays. Of the "She would if ſhe could (39)," the Critic Dennis ſays, that, though it was eſteemed by the men of ſenſe for the trueneſs of ſome its characters, and the purity, freeneſs, and eaſy grace of its dialogue, yet, on its firſt appearance, it was barbarouſly treated by the audience. If the auditors were offended with the licentiouſneſs of the comedy, their barbarity did them honour; but, it is probable that, at that period, they were influenced by ſome other conſideration. Excluſively of its looſe tendency, the play is pronounced to be undoubtedly a very good one; and it was eſteemed as one of the firſt rank at the time in which it was written (40). However, Shadwell's encomium upon it, mentioned in Note C, will be judged to be too extravagant.

But the production of Sir George Etherege, which has been moſt applauded, and, on which his reputation has been principally founded, is his "Man of 'Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter." 'This,' ſays the Biographia Dramatica, 'is an admirable play. The 'characters in it are ſtrongly marked, the plot agree-'ably conducted, and the dialogue truely polite and 'elegant. The character of Dorimant is, perhaps, 'the only completely fine gentleman that has ever yet 'been brought on the Engliſh ſtage; at the ſame time, 'that in that of Sir Fopling may be traced the ground-'work of almoſt all the Foppingtons and petit maitres 'which appeared in the ſucceeding comedies of that 'period (41).' In another part of the Biographia Dramatica it is aſſerted, that "The Man of Mode" is, perhaps, the moſt elegant comedy, and contains more of the real manners of high life, than any one with which the Engliſh ſtage was ever adorned (42). That the play exhibits a ſpirited repreſentation of what were then living characters is not denied; but, to the praiſes which are ſo generally and indiſcriminately given of it, we muſt be permitted to oppoſe the cenſures of Sir Richard Steel, in the ſixty-fifth number of the Spectator. Theſe cenſures have been very feebly anſwered, in Note E, by our learned predeceſſor.] K.

EVELYN (JOHN), a great Philoſopher, a worthy Patriot, and a learned writer in the XVIIth century. He was deſcended from a very antient and honourable family, as appears from ſeveral authentic vouchers, a branch of which, at the time of his birth, was ſettled in the county of Surrey, though it flouriſhed originally in the county of Salop, at a place which is ſtill called Evelyn (a) [A]. George Evelyn, Eſq. purchaſed the eſtate of the family at Wotton in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and had by two wives ſixteen ſons and eight daughters; he departed this life May 30, 1603, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, leaving his eſtate at Wotton to Richard Evelyn, Eſq. his youngeſt and only ſurviving ſon by his ſecond wife (b). This Richard Evelyn, Eſq. married Eleanor, daughter and heireſs of John Standfield of Lewes, in the county of Suſſex, Eſq. and was a perſon of great worth and virtue (c) [B]. He had, by the Lady beforementioned, three ſons, viz. George, John, and Richard: of the ſecond of theſe, John, we are to ſpeak in this article. He was born October 31, 1620, at his father's ſeat at Wotton (d), and was very carefully educated in his tender years, receiving the firſt elements of learning at the free-ſchool at Lewes in Suſſex, whence he removed, in 1637, to Baliol-College, Oxford (e), where, as a Gentleman-Commoner, he remained till the breaking out of the Civil War, when he repaired to Oxford, and obtained leave from King Charles I, under his own hand, to travel beyond the ſeas for his improvement (f). In the Spring of 1644, he left England, in order to make the tour of Europe, which he performed very ſucceſsfully, making it his buſineſs to enquire carefully into the ſtate of the Sciences, and the improvements made in all uſeful arts, wherever he came; concerning which he made very large and valuable collections, the contents of which he moſt generouſly communicated to all ſuch as applied to him for information (g). He ſpent ſome time at Rome, and having an opportunity there to learn the true ſentiments of the Papiſts upon the cutting off Archbiſhop Laud's head, he thought himſelf obliged, in juſtice to that great Prelate's memory, to give an atteſtation thereof under his own hand (h) [C]. [A] At a place which is ſtill called Evelyn.] Our Author himſelf had taken great pains to enquire into the origin of his family; in conſequence of which, he found that they had formerly written their name Avelyn and Ivelyn, as well as Evelyn, which might be confirmed by a variety of inſtances. He was likewiſe informed, that a branch of their family flouriſhed in France, and that one of them was taken priſoner at the battle of Agincourt. But what had more of certainty, and deſerved better to be depended upon, was taken from the tradition of the family, that they came from Long Ditton into Surrey, and to Long Ditton, from Harrow on the Hill; but that, originally, they were ſeated at the town of Evelyn, in the hundred of South Bradford, in the County of Salop; of which county alſo, he reports, that the Onſlows likewiſe were, who removed about the ſame time from a place of that name, in the neighbourhood of Shrewſbury; as the Hattons alſo did from a place called Cold Hatton, in the ſame hundred with Evelyn, in Shropſhire; and, which is very remarkable, all ſettled again near each other in Surrey (1). George Evelyn, Eſq. the founder of this branch of the Evelyns, in Surrey, firſt carried the art of making gunpowder to perfection in England, and, for the conveniency of his works in the neighbourhood, purchaſed an eſtate at Wotton of one Mr. Owen; but who were the owners of this place in early times does not appear (2). This George Evelyn had a conſiderable intereſt at Court, and procured from Queen Elizabeth a grant, in conjunction with Thomas Reeves, of the Rectory of St. Nicolas Coleabby, in Queenhithe Ward, London, which afterwards came by meſne conveyances to the family of the Hackers, and by the attainder of Colonel Francis Hacker, who commanded the guard when King Charles the Firſt was murdered, came again to the Crown (3). It was in the latter part of his life that this gentleman came to live at Wotton, which, however, did not hinder him from planting there, as appears from what our Author himſelf tells us (4). 'In a word, to give an inſtance of what ſtore of woods 'and timber of prodigious ſize there were growing in 'our little county of Surrey, the neareſt of any to 'London, and plentifully furniſhed, both for profit 'and pleaſure, with ſufficient grief and reluctancy I 'ſpeak it, my own grandfather had ſtanding at Wot'ton, and about that eſtate, timber that now were 'worth one hundred thouſand pounds; ſince, of what 'was left my father, who was a great preſerver of 'wood, there has been thirty thouſand pounds worth 'of timber fallen by the axe and the fury of the late 'hurricane and ſtorm: now no more; Wotton ſtript 'and naked, and aſhamed almoſt to own its name.'

[B] Of great worth and virtue.] Richard Evelyn, Eſq. mentioned in the text, had, beſides his three ſons, two daughters, Elizabeth, who married Edward Darey, of Dartford, in Kent, Eſq. and Jane, the wife of William Glanville, Eſq. (5). George Evelyn, Eſq. elder brother to our Author, enjoyed the family eſtate at Wotton fifty-eight years; and dying in 1698, at the age of eighty-three, he left it to his brother John. He was a perſon of great worth, and generally eſteemed by his neighbours, as appeared from his being frequently elected Knight of the Shire for the County of Surrey (6). In his time, there was a very extraordinary diſcovery made upon opening the family vault, of which there is a full account in the additions to the Engliſh Britannia, which there is ſo much the more reaſon to credit as thoſe additions came from our Author himſelf. After deſcribing the ridge of hills that divide Surrey from Suſſex and Kent, he proceeds thus (7): 'Not far from the bottom, ſtands an an'cient ſeat of the Evelyns, of Wotton, among ſeveral 'ſtreams gliding through the meadows, adorned with 'gentle riſings and woods, which as it were encom'paſs it. And theſe, together with the gardens, 'fountains, and other hortulane ornaments, have 'given it a place and name amongſt the moſt agreeable 'ſeats. In opening the ground of the churchyard of 'Wotton, to enlarge a vault belonging to this family, 'they met with a ſkeleton, which was nine foot and 'three inches long, as the (*) worthy and famous Mr. 'John Evelyn had it atteſted, by an antient and un'derſtanding man then preſent, who accordingly 'meaſured it and marked the length on a pole, with 'other workmen, who affirmed the ſame. They 'found it lying in full-length between two boards of 'the coffin, and meaſured it before they had diſcom'poſed the bones. But, trying to take it out, it fell 'all to pieces; for which reaſon they flung it amongſt 'the reſt of the rubbiſh, after they had ſeparately 'meaſured ſeveral of the more ſolid bones.'

(*) Theſe epithets added ſince our author's deceaſe.

[C] Under his own hand.] In order to underſtand this matter, it is neceſſary that the reader ſhould know, proving himſelf in Architecture, Painting, the knowledge of Antiquities, Medals, and other branches of polite literature, and, at the ſame time, left nothing unexamined, that could contribute to the perfect underſtanding of Natural Philoſophy, to which, beyond all other ſciences, he was paſſionately addicted. We have an inſtance of his care and induſtry in this reſpect, preſerved by one of the greateſt and moſt intelligent Philoſophers of this or any other country (i) [D]. In 1647, Mr. Evelyn came to Paris, where, being recommended to Sir Richard Browne, Bart. the King's Miniſter there, he made his addreſſes to his only daughter Mary, whom he not long after married, and in her right became poſſeſſed of Sayes Court, near Deptford, in Kent, where he reſided after his return to England, which was about the year 1651 (k). He had before that time recommended himſelf to the notice of the learned world, by publiſhing ſeveral treatiſes which were extremely well received, and the leiſure he had in his retreat at Sayes-Court, after his return, put it in his power to add quickly to their number. Theſe were for the moſt part tranſlations, either from the learned or modern languages, for he was perfectly verſed in both, without any unreaſonable prepoſſeſſions in favour of Antiquity, or prejudice againſt it. Such kind of labours, whatever they may be thought of now when tranſlations are become common, were then very juſtly eſteemed, and were, without queſtion, highly ſerviceable, as well in propagating uſeful knowledge as in the improvement of our ſtyle, of which Mr. Evelyn was a great maſknow, that, amongſt other things charged upon Archbiſhop Laud, one was, that he had endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England to the Church of Rome, and had kept a ſecret correſpondence with the Pope; and, to maintain this, witneſſes were called to ſhew in what credit he ſtood at Rome. Sir Henry Mildmay had told the Archbiſhop in private diſcourſe, that he was the moſt hateful man there, that had ever ſat in the See of Canterbury ſince the Reformation; but, when he was examined as a witneſs, he affirmed that there were two factions at Rome, one of which did indeed ſpeak very ill of the Archbiſhop, but the other ſpoke very well of him. The Archbiſhop intimated, that he did not believe Sir Henry Mildmay had ever been at Rome. Mr. Chaloner depoſed, that at Rome ſome had a good opinion of the Archbiſhop, and thought him well inclined to them, for which reaſon they prayed for him. Mr. Anthony Mildmay ſeconded his brother's account, and ſaid, that the Jeſuits hated him, but that the ſecular Prieſts loved the Archbiſhop very well, but this was hearſay only (8). After the Archbiſhop's death, this matter was much talked of, and therefore, as Mr. Evelyn happened to be at Rome when the Archbiſhop was put to death, he was deſired to give ſome account of the general ſentiments of people there, which he accordingly did in the following certificate (9).

"I was at Rome in the company of divers of the Engliſh Fathers, when the news of the Archbiſhop's ſufferings, and a copy of his ſermon, made upon the ſcaffold, came thither. They read the ſermon, and commented upon it, with no ſmall ſatisfaction and contempt, and looked upon him as one that was a great enemy to them, and ſtood in their way, whilſt one of the blackeſt crimes imputed to him was his being popiſhly affected.

"JOHN EVELYN."

[D] Of this or any other country.] The perſon mentioned in the text is the honourable Mr. Boyle; who, ſpeaking of the effects of cold, and of the reaſons there are to believe that they may ſubſiſt even after the cold which produced them ceaſes, provided they are not expoſed to a degree of heat that muſt deſtroy them, mentions the preſerving of ſnow the whole year round in repoſitories far from being cold enough to produce ſuch an effect; which therefore ought to be attributed to the bare keeping of the ſnow from being expoſed to warm air. To illuſtrate this, that learned man tells us, he intended to have cited, from ſome books, an account of theſe ſtore-houſes, which he remembered to have ſeen in Italy; but, miſſing of his expectation in books, he endeavoured to ſupply it by enquiry.———But let him tell the reſt of his ſtory himſelf.——Meeting therefore the other day, ſays he (10), with my ingenious friend, Mr. John Evelyn, his inquiſitive travels, and his inſight into the more polite kinds of knowledge, and particularly architecture, made me deſire and expect of him that account of the Italian way of making conſervatories of ſnow, that I had miſſed of in ſeveral authors; and, having readily obtained my deſire of him, I ſhall not injure ſo juſtly-eſteemed a ſtyle as his, to deliver his deſcriptions in any other words than thoſe enſuing ones wherein I received it from him. 'The 'ſnow-pits in Italy, &c. are ſunk in the moſt ſolitary 'and cooled places, commonly at the foot of ſome 'mountain, or elevated ground, which may beſt protect them from the meridional and occidental ſun: 'twenty-five foot wide at the orifice, and about fifty 'in depth, is eſteemed a competent proportion. And 'though this be excavated in a conical form, yet it 'is made flat at the bottom or point. The ſides of 'the pit are ſo joiſted, that boards may be nailed 'upon them very cloſely jointed. His Majeſty's at 'Greenwich, newly made on the ſide of the caſtle 'hill, is, as I remember, ſteened with brick, and 'hardly ſo wide at the mouth. About a yard from 'the bottom, is fixed a ſtrong frame, or treſſel, upon 'which lies a kind of wooden grate; the top or cover 'is double-thatched with reed or ſtraw, upon a copped 'frame or roof, in one of the ſides whereof is a narrow door-caſe, hipped on like the top of a dormer, 'and thatched, and ſo it is complete.' To conſerve ſnow. 'They lay clean ſtraw upon the grate, or wattle, ſo as to keep the ſnow from running through, 'whilſt they beat it to a hard cake of any icy conſiſtence, which is near one foot thick; upon this 'they make a layer of ſtraw, and on that ſnow beaten 'as before; and ſo continue a bed of ſnow and a 'bed of ſtraw S. S. S. till the pit be full to the brim. 'Finally, they lay ſtraw or reed, for I remember to 'have ſeen both, a competent thickneſs over all, and 'keep the door locked. This grate is contrived, that 'the ſnow melting by any accident in laying, or extraordinary ſeaſon of weather, may drain away from 'the maſs, and ſink without ſtagnating upon it, which 'would accelerate the diſſolution, and therefore the 'very bottom is but ſlightly ſteened. Thoſe who are 'moſt circumſpect and curious preſerve a tall circle 'of ſhady trees about the pit, which may rather ſhade 'than drip upon it.' This is certainly an admirable ſpecimen of that care with which our Author regiſtered his diſcoveries, as well as the curioſity which prompted him to enquire into every thing worthy of notice, either natural or artificial, in the countries through which he paſſed. It is much to be regretted, that a work ſo entertaining and inſtructive, as the hiſtory of his travels would have been, appeared, even to ſo indefatigable a perſon as he was, a taſk for him too laborious to undertake; for, we ſhould have then ſeen clearly, and in a true light, many things in reference to Italy, which are now very indiſtinctly and partially repreſented; and we ſhould alſo have met with much new matter never touched before, and of which we ſhall now probably never hear at all.

ter, as theſe treatiſes, if he had left none beſides, might ſufficiently demonſtrate [E]. The ſituation of public affairs induced him to conſider that privacy with which he lived at Sayes-Court as a very great bleſſing; and ſo fond was he of this rural retreat, that he was very deſirous of making it his ſettled courſe of life, though but a young man, with a conſiderable fortune, and extremely admired and courted by all his acquaintance. This ſtudious diſpoſition, together with his diſguſt of the world, occaſioned by that ſtrange ſcene of violence ond confuſion that was then acted upon the public ſtage, was ſo ſtrong, that he actually propoſed to the Honourable Mr. Robert Boyle, the raiſing of a kind of college for the reception of perſons of the ſame turn of mind, where they might enjoy the pleaſure of agreeable ſociety, and at the ſame time paſs their days without care or interruption. His ſcheme for ſuch an eſtabliſhment is equally entertaining and curious [F]. But, when a proſpect appeared of better times, it occaſioned ſome

[E] Might ſufficiently demonſtrate.] As ſeveral of theſe treatiſes were printed before the Author's return to England, and others without his name; ſo we muſt depend upon the general opinion of the world, and the authority of Mr. Wood, for their being his: yet there is no great reaſon to ſuſpect any miſtake, ſince the account of them was publiſhed in his life-time, and therefore Mr. Evelyn had an opportunity of ſetting the world right, if any error had been committed of conſequence enough to have merited his notice.

There is a copy of verſes by Edmund Waller, Eſq. of Beaconsfield, prefixed and directed to his worthy friend Mr. Evelyn; and part of the character he gives him is worthy the reader's attention. After deſcribing the ſubject of the book, he proceeds thus:

So vaſt this argument did ſeem,
That the wiſe author did eſteem
The Roman language (which was ſpread O'er the whole world in triumph led)
A tongue too narrow to unfold
The wonders which he would have told.
This ſpeaks thy glory, noble friend,
And Britiſh language does commend.
For, here Lucretius whole we find,
His words, his muſick, and his mind.

All that he writ and all he thought.

Nor Lucan we, nor Horace ſpar'd,
Only Lucretius was too hard.
Lucretius, like a fort, did ſtand
Untouch'd, till your victorious hand
Did from his head this garland bear,

[F] Is equally entertaining and curious.] The letter, in which this plan of a college is contained, is directed to the Hon. Mr. Robert Boyle, and dated from Sayes-Court, September 3, 1659. Our author expreſſes himſelf very much at large, and very pathetically repreſents, though with great caution and modeſty, the miſeries of the times, and the reaſons which might induce men of true virtue and ſtrict ſcience to think of ſheltring themſelves in ſome quiet retreat, from the diſagreeable accidents to which they might be liable, in ſuch times, and amongſt ſuch men, as the world then abounded with. He declares, that, if he had been a ſingle perſon, and without family, he would, without heſitation, have dedicated his fortune to the raiſing ſuch a college as he propoſed, to the thoughts of which he ſeems to have been led by a diſcourſe of the great Lord Chancellor Bacon's. He likewiſe obſerves, that, notwithſtanding his ſituation in the world prevented him from undertaking ſuch a thing alone, yet nothing could give him greater pleaſure than the hopes of aſſociating Mr. Boyle therein. He ſays farther, that, though this project had been long ſwimming in his mind, yet he had never communicated it to any perſon whatſoever, ſo that Mr. Boyle need not be under any apprehenſions of opening himſelf freely upon a thing of ſo private a nature. He adds to all this, that he had no particular cauſe of diſcontent, being, with reſpect to his circumſtances, perfectly eaſy, happy, and ſatisfied in his family; well reſpected in the world; and, in all things, as free from the neceſſity of looking for ſuch a retreat, excluſively of his own inclination, as any Gentleman whatever. Without taking notice of theſe parts of his letter, the plan itſelf would be ſcarcely intelligible. To have tranſcribed them at large would have ſwelled this note beyond its proper bounds; and therefore I judged it proper to contract them: but, with reſpect to the author's ſcheme, which is very curious and entertaining, at the ſame time that it has a cloſe relation to his perſonal hiſtory, it is certainly requiſite that it ſhould appear in his own words. No doubt Mr. Boyle wrote an anſwer to it, which would have been well worth the peruſal; but whether that be ſtill preſerved or not is very uncertain. As for Mr. Evelyn's propoſal, it runs thus (11):

'I propoſe the purchaſing of thirty or forty acres of 'land, in ſome healthy place, not above twenty five 'miles from London, of which a good part ſhould be 'tall wood, and the reſt upland paſtures, or downs 'ſweetly irrigated. If there were not already an houſe 'which might be converted, &c. we would erect, 'upon the moſt convenient ſite of this near the wood, 'our building, viz. one handſome pavillion, con'taining a refectory, library, withdrawing-room, and 'a cloſet; this the firſt ſtory: for, we ſuppoſe the 'kitchen, larders, cellars, and offices, to be contrived 'in the half-ſtory under ground. In the ſecond ſhould 'be a fair lodging-chamber, a pallet-room, gallery, 'and a cloſet, all which ſhould be well and very nobly 'furniſhed, for any worthy perſon that might deſire to 'ſtay any time, and for the reputation of the college. ſome change in his ſentiments; and, upon an attempt being made to damp the deſires of the people for the King's return, he drew his pen in that critical ſeaſon in defence of his Majeſty's Character (m), which, at ſuch a juncture, was both an acceptable, and a very important ſervice [G]. Immediately after the King's return, Mr. Evelyn was introduced

' and at the other back-front, a plot walled in, of a ' competent ſquare for the common ſeraglio, diſpoſed ' into a garden, or it might be only carpet, kept cu- ' rioufly, and to ſerve for bowls, walking, or other ' recreations, &c. if the company pleaſe. Oppoſite ' to the houſe, towards the wood, ſhould be erected a ' pretty chapel, and, at equal diſtances, even within ' the flanking walls of the ſquare, ſix apartments or ' cells for the members of the ſociety, and not conti- ' guous to the pavillion, each whereof ſhould contain ' a ſmall bed-chamber, an outward room, a cloſet, and ' a private garden, ſomewhat after the manner of the ' Carthuſians. There ſhould likewiſe be an elabo- ' ratory, with a repoſitory for rarities and things of na- ' ture; aviary, dove-houſe, phyſick-garden, kitchen- ' garden, and a plantation of orchard-fruit, &c. all ' uniform buildings, but of ſingle ſtories, or a little ' elevated. At a convenient diſtance, towards the oli- ' tory garden, ſhould be a ſtable for two or three ' horſes, and a lodging for a ſervant or two. Laſtly, ' a garden-houſe and conſervatory for tender plants. ' The eſtimate amounts thus: the pavillion 400 l. ' the chapel, one hundred and fifty pounds; apart- ' ments, walls, and out-houſing, ſix hundred pounds; ' the purchaſe of a fee for thirty acres, at fifteen ' pounds; ſixteen hundred pounds will be the utmoſt. ' Three of the cells, or apartments, that is, one ' moiety with the appurtenances, ſhall be at the diſ- ' poſal of one of the founders, and the other half at ' the others. If I and my wife take up two apart- ' ments (for we are to be decently aſunder, however, I ' ſtipulate, and her inclination will greatly ſuit with it, ' that ſhall be no impediment to the ſociety, but a ' conſiderable advantage to the œconomic part), a third ' ſhall be for ſome worthy perſon; and, to facilitate ' the reſt, I offer to furniſh the whole pavillion com- ' pletely to the value of five hundred pounds, in goods ' and movables, if need be for ſeven years, till there ' ſhall be a public ſtock, &c. There ſhall be main- ' tained, at the public charge, only a Chaplain well ' qualified, an antient woman to dreſs the meat, waſh, ' and do all ſuch offices; a man to buy proviſion, ' keep the garden, horſes, &c. a boy to aſſiſt him and ' ſerve within. At one meal a day, of two diſhes ' only, unleſs ſome little extraordinary upon particular ' days or occaſions (then never exceeding three) of plain ' and wholeſome meat; a ſmall refection at night: ' wine, beer, ſugar, ſpice, bread, fiſh, fowl, candle, ' ſoap, oats, hay, fuel, &c. at four pounds per week, ' two hundred pounds per annum; wages, fifteen ' pounds; keeping the gardens, twenty pounds; the ' Chaplain, twenty pounds per annum. Laid up in ' the treaſury one hundred forty-five pounds, to be em- ' ployed for books, inſtruments, drugs, trials, &c. The ' total, four hundred pounds a year, comprehending the ' keeping of two horſes for the chariot, or the ſaddle, ' and two kine; ſo that two hundred pounds per an- ' num will be the utmoſt that the founders ſhall be at ' to maintain the whole ſociety, conſiſting of nine per- ' ſons (the ſervants included), though there ſhould no ' others join capable to alleviate the expence. But, if ' any of thoſe who deſire to be of the ſociety be ſo ' well qualified as to ſupport their own particulars, and ' allow for their proportion, it will yet much diminiſh ' the charge; and of ſuch there cannot want ſome at all ' times, as the apartments are empty. If either of the ' founders thinks expedient to alter his condition, or ' that any thing do humanitus contingere, he may re- ' ſign to another, or ſell to his colleague, and diſpoſe ' of it as he pleaſes, yet ſo as it ſtill continue the in- ' ſtitution. Orders. At ſix, in ſummer, prayers in the ' chapel. To ſtudy till half an hour after eleven. ' Dinner in the refectory till one. Retire till four. ' Then called to converſation (if the weather invite) ' abroad, elſe in the refectory. This never omitted ' but in caſe of ſickneſs. Prayers at ſeven. To bed ' at nine. In the winter the ſame, with ſome abate- ' ments for the hours, becauſe the nights are tedious, ' and the evening's converſation more agreeable. This ' in the refectory. All play interdicted, ſans bowls, ' cheſs, &c. Every one to cultivate his own garden. ' One month in ſpring a courſe in the elaboratory on ' vegetables, &c. In the winter a month on other ' experiments. Every man to have a key of the ela- ' boratory, pavilion, library, repoſitory, &c. Weekly ' faſt. Communion once every fortnight, or month ' at leaſt. No ſtranger eaſily admitted to viſit any of ' the ſociety, but upon certain days weekly, and that ' only after dinner. Any of the ſociety may have ' his commons to his apartment, if he will not meet ' in the refectory, ſo it be not above twice a week. ' Every Thurſday ſhall be a muſick-meeting at con- ' verſation hours. Every perſon of the ſociety ſhall ' render ſome public account of his ſtudies weekly, ' if thought fit, and eſpecially ſhall be recommended ' the promotion of experimental knowledge, as the ' principal end of the inſtitution. There ſhall be a ' a decent habit and uniform uſed in the college. One ' month in the year may be ſpent in London, or any ' of the Univerſities, or in a perambulation for the ' public benefit, &c. with what other orders ſhall be ' thought convenient.'

[G] And a very important ſervice.] The conduct of Mr. Evelyn in this critical year, 1659, which was in truth the moſt active in his whole life, is hardly taken notice of by any of thoſe who have undertaken to preſerve his memoirs, and therefore we will endeavour to give the reader as much light into it as poſſible. After the death of Oliver and the depoſition of Richard Cromwell, there were many of the Commanders in the army that ſhewed an inclination to reconcile themſelves to the King, which diſpoſition of theirs was very much encouraged by ſuch as had his Majeſty's intereſt truly at heart. Amongſt theſe, Mr. Evelyn had a particular eye upon Colonel Herbert Morley (12), an old experienced officer in the Parliament Army, who had two ſtout regiments entirely at his devotion, was very much eſteemed by his party, and had the general reputation of being a perſon of probity and honour. It was a very dangerous ſtep, as things then ſtood, to make any advances to one in his ſituation; yet Mr. Evelyn, conſidering how much it might be in that gentleman's power to facilitate the King's return, fairly ventured his life, by adviſing the Colonel freely to make his peace with, and enter into the ſervice of, the King. The Colonel, as might well be expected, acted coldly and cautiouſly at firſt, but at laſt accepted Mr. Evelyn's offer, and deſired him to make uſe of his intereſt to procure a pardon for himſelf, and ſome of his relations and friends whom he named, promiſing in return to give all the aſſiſtance in his power to the royal cauſe. At the ſame time that Mr. Evelyn carried on this dangerous intercourſe with Colonel Morley, he formed a reſolution of publiſhing ſomething that might take off the edge of that inveteracy, expreſſed by thoſe who had been deepeſt in the Parliament's intereſt, againſt ſuch as had always adhered to the King, and with this view he wrote a ſmall treatiſe which had the deſired effect, and was ſo generally well received, that it ran through three impreſſions that year. The title of this piece was (13),

But, while Mr. Evelyn and other gentlemen of his ſentiments were thus employed, thoſe of the contrary party were not idle; and, amongſt theſe, one Marchamont Needham, who firſt wrote with great bitterneſs for the King againſt the Parliament, and afterwards with equal acrimony for the Parliament againſt the King, was induced to pen that piece mentioned in the text, which was deſervedly reckoned one of the moſt introduced to, and graciouſly received by, him, nor was it long before he received a very ſingular mark of the King's eſteem for, and confidence in, him. It happened thus: there had many troubles and diſputes fallen out between the Ambaſſadors of the crowns of France and Spain, for precedence in the Courts of foreign Princes, and amongſt theſe there was none more remarkable than that upon Tower-hill, on the landing of an Ambaſſador from Sweden, September 30, 1660, which was ſo premeditated a buſineſs on both ſides, that the King, foreſeeing it would come to a quarrel (n), and being willing to carry himſelf with indifference towards both, which could not be otherwiſe done, than leaving them at liberty to take what methods they thought proper for ſupporting their reſpective pretences, but to ſhew at the ſame time his concern for the public tranquillity, orders were given for a ſtrict guard to be kept upon the place, and all his Majeſty's ſubjects were enjoined not to intermeddle, or take part with either ſide; and the King was farther pleaſed to command, that Mr. Evelyn ſhould, after diligent enquiry made, draw up and preſent him a diſtinct narrative of the whole affair, which he accordingly did, and it is a very curious and remarkable piece, though not taken notice of in any of the accounts of our author's writings, which is the reaſon of our ſpeaking of it with all its circumſtances [H]. Our author began now to enter into artful and dangerous contrivances, for impeding that healing ſpirit that began now to ſpread itſelf through the nation, and with that view was handed to the preſs by Praiſe-God Barebone, one of the fierceſt zealots in thoſe times, the title of which, at large, runs thus (14): "News from Bruſſels, in a Letter from a "near Attendant on his Majeſty's Perſon, to a Perſon "of honour here, dated March the 10th, 1659." The deſign of this pretended letter was to repreſent the character of King Charles the Second in as bad a light as poſſible, in order to deſtroy the favourable impreſſions that many had received of his natural inclination to mildneſs and clemency. All the King's friends were extremely alarmed at this attempt, and ſaw plainly that it would be attended with moſt pernicious conſequences; but Mr. Evelyn, who had as quick a foreſight as any of them, reſolved to loſe no time in furniſhing an antidote againſt this poiſon, and with great diligence and dexterity, ſent abroad in a week's time a complete anſwer, which bore the following title:

VIII. "The late News or Meſſage from Bruſſels "unmaſked." Lond. 1659 4to.

This was certainly a very ſeaſonable and very important ſervice, which, for his own ſafety our Author managed with ſuch ſecrecy, that hardly any body knew from whom this pamphlet came. But how much ſoever he had reaſon to be pleaſed with the ſucceſs of his pen upon this occaſion, he could not help being extremely mortified at the change he perceived in his friend Colonel Morley's behaviour, who on a ſudden grew very ſilent and reſerved, and at length plainly avoided any private converſation with Mr. Evelyn. In this ſituation our Author had the courage to write him an expoſtulatory letter, which was in effect putting his life into his hands, and yet even this failed of procuring him the ſatisfaction he expected. However, he felt no inconvenience from it; for, this alteration in Colonel Morley's countenance towards him, was not at all the effects of any change in his diſpoſition, but aroſe from his having entered into new engagements for the King's ſervice with Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper and General Monk (15), who had tied him down to ſuch abſolute ſecrecy, that he was not able at that juncture to give Mr. Evelyn any hint that might make him eaſy; but by degrees theſe clouds were diſpelled, and he ſaw plainly enough from the Colonel's public behaviour, that he had no reaſon to apprehend any miſchief from the confidence he had repoſed in him.

[H] With all its circumſtances.] This piece of Mr. Evelyn's is very curious; and, not being to be met with in any of his works, the reader cannot be diſpleaſed with having this opportunity of peruſing it, more eſpecially when he ſees, by the concluſion, what the conſequences were of this political riot. The title of it ran thus: "The Manner of the Encounter, be-"tween the French and Spaniſh Ambaſſadors, at the "Landing of the Swediſh Ambaſſador."

'Upon Monday laſt, being the 30th of September, 'about ten in the morning the Spaniſh Ambaſſador's 'coach, in which were his Chaplain with ſome of 'his gentlemen, attended by about forty more of his 'ſervants in livery, was ſent down to the Tower 'wharf, and there placed itſelf near about the point, 'where the ranks of ordnance determine towards the 'gate leading into the bulwark. Next after him came 'the Dutch and (twelve a-clock paſt) the Swediſh 'coach of honour, diſpoſing of themſelves according 'to their places. About two hours after this (in 'company with his Majeſty's Coach Royal) appeared 'that of the French Ambaſſador's, wherein were Le 'Marquis d'Eſtrade, ſon to the French Ambaſſador, 'with ſeveral more of his gentlemen, and, as might 'be computed, near an hundred and fifty in train, 'whereof above forty were horſemen well appointed, 'with piſtols, and ſome of them with carabines, muſ-'quetoons, or fuzees: in this poſture and equipage 'ſtood they expecting upon the wharf, and as near 'as might be, approaching to his Majeſty's coach, 'which was oppoſite to the ſtairs, about three in the 'afternoon, the Swediſh Ambaſſador being landed, 'and received into his Majeſty's coach, which moved 'leiſurely before the reſt, and was followed by that 'of the Swede's. The French Ambaſſador's coach en-'deavoured to go the next, driving as cloſe as poſſibly 'they could, and advancing their party with their 'ſwords drawn, to force the Spaniards from the guard 'of their own coach, which were alſo putting in for 'precedency next the King's. His Majeſty's coach 'now paſt the Spaniard's, who held as yet their rapiers 'undrawn in their hands, ſtepping nimbly on either 'ſide of the hindmoſt wheels of their maſter's coach, 'drew their weapons and ſhouted, which cauſed the 'French coach-horſes to make a pauſe: but, when 'they obſerved the advantage, which by this the 'Spaniſh Ambaſſador's coach had gained, being now 'in file after the Swedes, they came up very near to 'the Spaniard's, and, at once pouring in their ſhot 'upon them, together with their foot, then got before 'their coach, fell to it with their ſwords, both which 'the Spaniards received without removing one jot 'from their ſtation.

'During this demeſle (in which the French re-'ceived ſome repulſe and were put to a ſecond ſtand), 'a bold and dextrous fellow, and as moſt affirm with 'a particular inſtrument as well as addreſs, ſtooping 'under the bellies of the French Ambaſſador's coach-'horſes, cut the hamſtrings of two of them, and 'wounded a third, which immediately falling, the 'coach for the preſent was diſabled from advancing 'farther, the coachman forced out of his box, and 'the poſtilion mortally wounded, who falling into 'the arms of an Engliſh gentleman that ſtepped in to 'his ſuccour, was by a Spaniard pierced through his 'thigh. This diſorder (wherein ſeveral were wounded 'and ſome ſlain) cauſed thoſe in the French to alight, 'and ſo enraged their party, that it occaſioned a ſe-'cond briſk aſſault both of horſe and foot, which 'being received with extraordinary gallantry, many 'of their horſe retreated and wheeled off to St. 'Katharine's.

into the active ſcenes of life, but yet without bidding adieu entirely to his ſtudies. On the contrary, he publiſhed, in the ſpace of a few months, ſeveral learned treatiſes upon different ſubjects (o), which met with great applauſe; the rather, becauſe the author expreſſed in ſome of them his intention to proſecute more largely ſeveral philoſophical ſubjects, in a manner that might render them conducive to the benefit of ſociety; and of his capacity for performing theſe promiſes, ſome of theſe pieces were inſtances ſufficient to ſatisfy every intelligent reader, as well as to juſtify the character he had already acquired, of being at once an able and agreeable writer [I]. About the cloſe of the year, 1662, when his Majeſty was pleaſed, by his Letters Patent, to erect and eſtabliſh the Royal Society for the improvement of natural knowledge, John Evelyn, Eſq. was appointed one of the firſt Fellows and Council (p). He had given a proof the ſame year how well he deſerved that diſtinction, by a ſmall, but excellent work of his, intituled, "Sculptura (q)," of which, as it is now become very ſcarce, an account ſhall be given in the notes [K]. Upon the firſt appearance of the nation's being obliged to

'It was in this ſkirmiſh, that ſome brickbats were 'thrown from the edge of the wharf, which by a 'miſtake are ſaid to have been provided by the Spa'niſh Ambaſſador's order the day before: but that 'they were not caſt by any of the Engliſh is atteſted 'by the general conſent of all the ſpectators.

'In this interim then (which was near half an 'hour) the Spaniſh coach went forward after his Ma'jeſty's, with about twenty of his retinue following, 'who ſtill kept their countenance towards the French 'as long as they abode on the wharf, and that nar'row paſſage of the bulwark (where the conteſt was 'very fierce) without diſorder: ſo as the firſt which 'appeared on Tower Hill, where now they were 'entering, was his Majeſty's coach followed by the 'Swedes Ambaſſador's, and next by that of Spain 'with about twenty-four or thirty of his Liveries ſtill 'diſputing it, with a leſs number of French who came 'after them in the rear.

'And here, beſides what were ſlain with bullets on 'the wharf, and near the bulwark, whereof one was 'a Valet de Chambre of the Spaniſh Ambaſſador's, 'and ſix more, amongſt which a poor Engliſh plaſte'rer, and near forty wounded, fell one of the French, 'who was killed juſt before his Highneſs's life-guard, 'no one perſon of the numerous ſpectators intermed'dling, or ſo much as making the leaſt noiſe or tu'mult, people or ſoldiers, whereof there were three 'companies of foot, which ſtood oppoſite on the hill 'to the Guards of Horſe, 'twixt whom the antago'niſts lightly ſkirmiſhed, ſome freſh parties of French 'coming out of ſeveral places and protected by the 'Engliſh, amongſt whom they found ſhelter till the 'Spaniſh Ambaſſador's coach having gained and 'paſſed the chain which leads into Crochet Friers, 'they deſiſted and gave them over.

'Whatever diſadvantage the French came off with 'in this rencounter, wherein except one man that 'fought among the Spaniards with a half pike, not 'any of the Engliſh were ſeen to act any thing that 'might contribute to the ſucceſs of one ſide more 'than another, till a few of the multitude which 'ſtood on that ſide of the wharf being enraged by 'the wounds, which they received from the ſhot that 'came in amongſt them, and whereof 'tis ſaid ſome 'of them afterwards died, were forced to defend 'themſelves with what they found at hand. For ſo 'careful was Sir Charles Berkeley, Captain of his 'Royal Highneſs's Life-Guard, to put in execution 'what he had in ſtrict charge from his Majeſty, that 'not a man of the ſpectators was ſuffered with impu'nity ſo much as with a ſwitch in his hand. The 'French King from this occaſion gained an advan'tage to the prerogative he ſtood upon, greater than 'if this conteſt had not happened. For, whereas this 'buſineſs of precedence had been hitherto in contro'verſy between him and Spain, inſomuch that, to 'prevent all inconveniences, an accord had been 'lately made here between the Spaniſh Ambaſſador 'and the Count of Soiſſons, that they ſhould aſſiſt at 'no public ceremonies, but upon all ſuch caſual en'counters paſs on their way as they fortuned to meet; 'the King of France countermanding this agree'ment, and ſending poſitive charge to D'Eſtrade not 'to abate any thing of thoſe pretenſions formerly 'ſtood upon, and hearing what enſued upon his Am'baſſador's executing of his injunctions, was ſo in'cenſed thereat, that the quarrel had proceeded to 'an abſolute breach of the late concluded peace be'tween the two Kingdoms, had not the King of 'Spain condeſcended to agree that thenceforward 'precedence ſhould be yielded to the French upon all 'ſuch like occaſions without any diſpute.'

[I] An able and agreeable writer.] It is certain that very few authors who have written in our language, deſerve this character ſo well as Mr. Evelyn, who, though he was acquainted with moſt ſciences, and wrote upon many different ſubjects, yet was very far, indeed the fartheſt of moſt men of his time, from being a ſuperficial writer. He had genius, he had taſte, he had learning, and he knew how to give all theſe a proper place in his works, ſo as never to paſs for a pedant, even with ſuch as were leaſt in love with literature, and to be juſtly eſteemed a polite author by thoſe who knew it beſt. His performances during this year, except one, were but light and trivial in compariſon of thoſe that he afterwards ſent abroad: but, it is neceſſary however, that the reader, who will expect a large account of thoſe, ſhould take notice of theſe likewiſe.

[K] In the notes.] Of this work which has been always looked upon as a very great curioſity, from the time of its publication to this day, the title at large runs thus. XIII. "Sculptura; or the Hiſtory and "Art of Calcography, and Engraving in Copper, with "an ample Enumeration of the moſt renowned Maſ"ters and their Works. To which is annexed, a new "Manner of Engraving, or Mezzo Tinto, commu"cated by his Highneſs Prince Rupert to the Author "of this Treatiſe." Lond. 1662. 8vo. In the dedication to Mr. Robert Boyle, dated at Sayes-Court, April 5th, 1662, he obſerves, that he wrote this Treatiſe at the reiterated inſtance of that gentleman. The firſt chapter treats of Sculpture, how derived and diſtinguiſhed, with the ſtyles and inſtruments belonging to it. The ſecond, of the original of Sculpture in general. In this chapter our Author obſerves, that letters, and conſequently ſculpture, were long before the Flood, Suidas aſcribing both letters and all the reſt of the Sciences to Adam. After the Flood, as he ſuppoſes, there were but few who make any conſiderable queſtion, that it might not be propagated by Noah to his poſterity, though ſome admit of none before Moſes. 'But what then ſhall we think of that to engage in a war with the Dutch, the King thought proper to appoint Commiſſioners to 'book of the wars of the Lord, which this ſacred 'Author mentions Num xxi. not to inſiſt upon the 'eighty-eighth and one hundred and nineteenth 'Pſalms, by many aſcribed to ſome of the patriarchs, 'his predeceſſors? Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, three 'hundred years after the Flood, and long before 'Moſes, engraved his ſecret and myſterious things in 'ſtone, as himſelf reports, reforming what had been 'depraved by the wicked Cham, ſome in letters, ſome 'in figures, and enigmatical characters, ſuch haply as 'were thoſe contained in the magnificent and ſtupen-'dous obeliſks, erected by Miſra, the firſt Egyptian 'Pharaoh, which being at leaſt four hundred years 'before Moſes, as the moſt indefatigable Kircher has 'computed, does greatly preſage their antiquity to 'have been before that holy prophet. But not to put 'too much ſtreſs upon ſupernatural tradition, this 'we are ſure of is of faith and without controverſy, 'that in Moſes we have the tables of ſtone engraven 'by the finger of God himſelf, where the command 'is expreſs even againſt the abuſe of this very art, as 'well as an inſtance of the idolatry atteſting that of 'Sculpture, "Thou ſhalt not make to thyſelf any 'graven image." But this, which is indeed the firſt 'writing that we have in Scripture to vouch for, does yet 'pre-ſuppoſe engraving to have been of much greater 'antiquity. What elſe were the Teraphim, what the 'Pentos ſtolen by Rachael? The Idols of Terah? Or 'the Egyptians? &c. But we forbear to expatiate: 'only that which Ben Syrac, ſomewhere in Eccle-'ſiaſticus delivered, that the original of idolatry was 'from images to preſerve the memory of the dead, 'as in proceſs of time by the flatterers of great men, 'it was turned to be an object of adoration, plainly 'infers graving to have been older than Idolatry.' But now, continues our Author, to recover its eſteem again beyond all prejudice (however by others abuſed as indeed many of the beſt things have been,) it was, we know, imputed for a ſpiritual talent in Bezaleel, and Aholiab, who made Intaglias to adorn the High Prieſt's Pectoral. And we have ſaid how the Egyptians reverenced it, as ſeeming to have uſed it before letters, or rather their Hieroglyphics, importing ſacred ſculpture, were thoſe elements by which they tranſmitted to poſterity what they eſteemed moſt worthy of record, and not, as ſome have imagined, wrapped up in thoſe enigmatical figures, the ſecrets of their arts both divine and ſecular: ſuch as were alſo the Horapollinis notæ, and all thoſe other venerable antiquities of this nature, tranſported to Rome out of Egypt, in no leſs than two and forty prodigious obeliſks, interpreted by the induſtrious Kircher. Suidas attributes the invention to the Father of the Faithful, others to Theut or Hermes, ſome to Cadmus and the Phœnicians. Bibliander will have letters and ſculpture from Adam, Joſephus from Henoch; Philo from Abraham, Euſebius from Moſes, Cyprian from Saturn, where by the way, becauſe it is ſaid he did Literas imprimere, Petrus Calober, who calls himſelf Pomponius Lætus, abſurdly deduces, that even the Typographical Art was known in the age of this Hero. But thence it deſcended to the Egyptians by Miſraim, and ſo was communicated to the Perſians, Medes, and Aſſyrians, thence to the Greeks, and laſtly to the Romans, whence it was derived to us, as Peter Crinitus, in his ſeventh book de honeſtâ Diſciplinâ, out of a very antient manuſcript, Bibliothecæ Septimianæ, ſeems to deduce. Now, ſhould all this but relate to the ſeveral characters, it ſhall yet ſerve our purpoſe, ſince whoever was the inventor of letters was alſo doubtleſs the father of Sculpture, as is apparent if not by the columns erected by Seth, (one whereof, Angelus Roccha, in his Bibliotheca Vaticana, preſumes to have been of braſs,) by ſeveral other inſtances, the writing with ink, paper, or parchment, being altogether a novelty in compariſon with the more antient forms and materials, ſuch as were the flit ſtones of ſlates, which ſucceeded the ſtately marbles, and preceded the thinner leaves of bark and tables of wood, which, from the German Bucher, ſignifying the Fagus or Beech-tree, whoſe fruit does ſtill with us retain the name of Beech-maſt, were called Books, to whatever voluble or folding matter applied. For, before the invention of paper, they uſed the leaves of palm, as Varro, de Sibylla; then the rinds of trees; afterwards ſheets of lead, linen, wax, and ivory, as Vopiſcus tells us. They wrote in ſilk among the Perſians and Chineſe, and laſtly were invented parchment and paper. But, whether in all theſe, or whatever the ſubject, were ſome few later excepted, it was ſtill by inſculping, ſcarifying, and making a kind of inciſion into it, eſpecially intending to conſign to poſterity their laws divine and human, Roman, Egyptian, or Hebrew: for ſo, of old,

——Verba minantia fixo
Ære ligabantur.

Thus were the Hieronicæ preſerved in the temple of Olympian Jove, and the Roman Conſuls in the Capitol; and, as by thoſe innumerable inſcriptions of irrefragable and undeniable antiquities does appear, we have already computed how probable it is, that Sculpture was in uſe in Egypt ſomewhat before, or at leaſt as ſoon as the Patriarch Abraham went thither. But the leſs diſcerning Greeks, who received it from the Egyptians, could tell us of no writings of theirs extant before Homer, if we will prefer the authority of Joſephus before that of Tatian, a learned Aſſyrian, and contemporary with Juſtin Martyr, where he mentions no leſs than ſeventeen Greek writers more ancient than Homer. There are alſo enumerated the names of twenty Argive Kings from Inachus to Agamemnon, which ſtrongly infers the means of recording by Sculpture, and Writing, to have been very ancient. For ſo we read, that the Poems of Heſiod were ingraven in lead. Ariſtotle mentions Daphne, a certain Devotreſs of Apollo Sabinus and Diodorus many others. But when or however it were, thence, as we obſerved, it traveled into Greece, that Theatre of Arts, where it ſoon arrived to the ſupremeſt height of perfection; when, being applied to the forming of figures, it was celebrated by all the witty men of thoſe and the ſucceeding ages. Homer tells us of the engraving in the ſhield of Achilles, Heſiod of that of Hercules, not to mention the ſculptures upon the chariot of the ſun deſcribed by the poet, becauſe it is altogether fictitious, though extremely ingenious, and whence they might have their Vehicula Cælata, mentioned by Q. Curtius. The third chapter treats of the reputation and progreſs of ſculpture among the Greeks and Romans down to the middle ages, with a diſcuſſion of ſome pretenſions to the invention of copper cuts, and their impreſſions. The fourth, of the invention and progreſs of Chalcography in particular, together with an ample enumeration of the moſt renowned maſters and their works. The fifth, of drawing and deſign, previous to the Art of Chalcography, and of the uſe of pictures, in order to the education of children. In this chapter our author, in honour of the art upon which he writes, diſcourſes thus: 'It was in the former chapter that we made rehearſal of the moſt renowned gravers and their works, not that we had 'no more to add to that number, but becauſe we 'would not mingle theſe illuſtrious names and qualities there, which we purpoſely reſerved for the 'crown of this diſcourſe. We did, therefore, forbear to mention what his Highneſs Prince Rupert's 'own hands have contributed to the dignity of that 'art, performing things, in graving, of which ſome 'enrich our collection comparable to the greateſt maſters, ſuch a ſpirit and addreſs there appears in all 'that he touches, and eſpecially in that of the Mezzotinto, of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter more at 'large, having firſt enumerated thoſe incomparable 'gravings of that his new and inimitable ſtyle, in 'both the great and little decollations of St. John the 'Baptiſt, the ſoldier holding a ſpear and leaning his 'hand to take care of the ſick and wounded. This was in November, 1664, and Mr. Evelyn was one of the number, having all the ports between Dover and Portſmouth in his diſtrict; and Sir Thomas Clifford, who was afterwards a Peer, and Lord High Treaſurer of England, was another of thoſe Commiſſioners (r). We find theſe particulars in a letter from our author to Mr. Boyle, in which he expreſſes how great a ſatisfaction it would have been to have had that worthy and charitable perſon for his colleague. His literary labours within the compaſs of this year were not only as great, but even greater than in any of thoſe preceding, which aroſe from the deſire the author had to ſupport the credit of the Royal Society, and, to convince the world, that Philoſophy

'hand on a ſhield, the two Mary Magdalens, the old 'man's head, that of Titian, &c.; after the ſame 'Titian, Georgion, and others. We have alſo ſeen a 'plate etched by the preſent French King, and other 'great perſons; the Right Honourable the Earl of 'Sandwich, ſometimes, as we are told, diverting 'himſelf with the burine, and herein imitating thoſe 'ancient and renowned heroes, whoſe names are 'loud in the trumpet of fame, for their ſkill and par-'ticular affection to theſe arts. For, ſuch, of old, 'were Lucius Manilius, and Fabius, noble Romans, 'Pacuvius the tragic poet, nephew to Ennius. So-'crates, the wiſeſt of men, and Plato himſelf, Me-'trodorus, and Pyrrhus the philoſopher, did both de-'ſign and paint; and ſo did Valentinian, Adrian, and 'Severus, Emperors, ſo as the great Paulus Æmilius 'eſteemed it of ſuch high importance, that he would 'needs have his ſon to be inſtructed in it, as in one 'of the moſt worthy and excellent accompliſhments 'belonging to a Prince. For the art of graving, 'Quintilian likewiſe celebrates Euphranor, a polite 'and rarely endowed perſon, and Pliny, in that chap-'ter, where he treats of the ſame art, obſerves, that 'there was never any one famous in it but who was 'by birth or education a gentleman. Therefore he and 'Galen, in their recenſion of the liberal arts, men-'tion that of graving, in particular, amongſt the moſt 'permanent; and, in the ſame catalogue, number it 'with Rhetorick, Geometry, Logic, Aſtronomy, yea, 'Grammar itſelf, becauſe there is in theſe arts, ſay 'they, more of fancy and invention than ſtrength of 'hand, more of the ſpirit than of the body. Hence 'Ariſtotle informs us, that the Grecians did univer-'ſally inſtitute their children in the art of painting 'and drawing, for an œconomique reaſon there ſigni-'fied, as well as to produce proportions in the mind. 'Varro makes it part of the ladies education, that 'they might have the better ſkill in the works of Em-'broidery, &c. and for this cauſe is his daughter 'Martia celebrated amongſt thoſe of her fair ſex. We 'have already mentioned the learned Anna Schur-'man; but the Princeſs Louiſa has done wonders of 'this kind, and is famous throughout Europe for the 'many pieces which enrich our cabinets, examples, 'ſufficient to vindicate its dignity, and the value that 'has been ſet upon it, ſince both Emperors, Kings, 'and Philoſophers, the great and the wiſe, have not 'diſdained to cultivate and cheriſh this honourable 'quality of old, ſo nobly reputed, that amongſt the 'Greeks a ſlave might not be taught it. How paſ-'ſionately does Pereſkius, that admirable and univer-'ſal genius, deplore his want of dexterity in this art! 'Baptiſta Alberti, Aldus Pomponius, Guaricus Durer, 'and Rubens, were politely learned and knowing 'men, and it is hardly to be imagined, of how great 'uſe and conducible a competent addreſs in this art 'of drawing and deſigning is to the ſeveral advan-'tages which occur, and eſpecially to the more noble 'mathematical ſciences, as we have already inſtanced 'in the lunary works of Hevelius, and are no leſs 'obliged to celebrate ſome of our own countrymen 'famous for their dexterity in this incomparable art. 'Such was that Blagrave, who himſelf cut thoſe dia-'grams in his Mathematical Jewel, and ſuch at pre-'ſent is that rare and early prodigy of univerſal ſci-'ence, Dr. Chr. Wren, our worthy and accompliſhed 'friend. For, if the ſtudy of Eloquence and Rheto-'rick were cultivated by the greateſt geniuſes and 'heroic perſons which the world has produced, and 'that by the ſuffrage of the moſt knowing to be a 'perfect orator, a man ought to be univerſally in-'ſtructed, a quality ſo becoming and uſeful ſhould 'never be neglected.' In the ſixth chapter, he diſ-courſes of the new way of engraving or mezzotinto, invented and communicated by his Highneſs Prince RUPERT, and he therein obſerves, 'that his High-'neſs did indulge him the liberty of publiſhing the 'whole manner and addreſs of this new way of en-'graving; but when I had well conſidered it, ſays he, '(ſo much having been already expreſſed, which may 'ſuffice to give the hint to all ingenious perſons how 'it is to be performed,) I did not think it neceſſary, 'that an art ſo curious, and as yet ſo little vulgar, 'and which indeed does not ſucceed where the work-'man is not an accompliſhed deſigner, and has a 'competent talent in painting likewiſe, was to be 'proſtituted at ſo cheap a rate as the more naked 'deſcribing of it here would too ſoon have expoſed 'it to. Upon theſe conſiderations, then, it is, that 'we leave it thus enigmatical; and yet that this may 'appear no diſingenuous rhodomontade in me, or in-'viduous excuſe, I profeſs myſelf to be always moſt 'ready ſub figillo, and by his Highneſs's permiſſion, 'to gratify any curious and worthy perſon with as 'full and perfect a demonſtration of the entire art 'as my talent and addreſs will reach to, if what I am 'now preparing to be reſerved in the Archives of 'the Royal Society concerning it be not ſufficiently 'inſtructive.' There came, however, into the hands of the communicative and learned Richard Middleton Maſſey, M. D. and F. R. S. the original manuſcript written by Mr. Evelyn, and deſigned for the Royal Society, intituled, "Prince Rupert's new way of En-"graving, communicated by his Highneſs to Mr. "Evelyn;" in the margin of which is this note, "This I prepared to be regiſtered in the Royal Soci-"ety, but I have not yet given it in, ſo as it ſtill con-"tinues a ſecret." In this manuſcript, he firſt de-ſcribes the two inſtruments employed in this new manner of engraving, viz. the Hatcher and the Style, and then proceeds to explain the method of uſing them. He concludes with the following words: 'This invention, or new manner of Chalcography, 'was the reſult of chance, and improved by a Ger-'man ſoldier, who eſpying ſome ſcrape on the barrel 'of his muſquet, and being of an ingenious ſpirit, re-'fined upon it, till it produced the effects you have 'ſeen, and which indeed is, for the delicacy thereof, 'much ſuperior to any invention extant of this Art, 'for the imitation of thoſe maſterly drawings, and as 'the Italians call it, that morbidezza expreſſed in the 'beſt of their deſigns. I have had the honour to be 'the firſt of the Engliſh to whom it has been yet com-'municated, and by a ſpecial indulgence of his High-'neſs, who with his own hands was pleaſed to direct 'me with permiſſion to publiſh it to the world: but I 'have eſteemed it a thing ſo curious, that I thought 'it would be to profane it, before I had firſt offered 'it to this illuſtrious Society. There is another way 'of engraving by rowelling a plate with an inſtrument, 'made like that which our Scriveners and Clerks uſe 'to direct their rulers by, on parchment, only the 'points are thicker ſet into the rowell. And when 'the plate is ſufficiently freckled with the frequent 'reciprocation of it, upon the poliſhed ſurface, ſo as 'to render the ground dark enough, it is to be abated 'with the ſtyle, and treated as we have already 'deſcribed. Of this ſort I have ſeen a head of the 'Queen Chriſtina, graved, if I miſtake not, as big as 'the life, but not comparable to the Mezzo Tinto of 'Prince Rupert, ſo deſervedly celebrated by

was not barely an amuſement fit to take up the time of melancholy and contemplative perſons, but a high and uſeful ſcience, worthy the attention of men of the greateſt parts, and capable of contributing in a ſupreme degree to the welfare of the nation (s). In this noble deſign, as never any man engaged with a better will, or proſecuted his intentions with greater diligence, ſo it may be truly ſaid, that never any advocate for Philoſophy employed his talents with greater ſucceſs. He exerted them alſo in the defence, and for the improvement, of the public taſte in Architecture and Painting, with equal vigour, and with equal applauſe. The ſame praiſes that were beſtowed upon him then have been continued in reſpect to his works from the gratitude of poſterity; nor are his learned efforts, in behalf of ſcience and the polite arts, leſs reliſhed now than at the time of their firſt appearance; a reward, which, though it may have been deſerved by many, has, however, been received by few, at leaſt with the ſame degree with our author, and is therefore an inconteſtible proof of his merit [L]. As there

[L] An inconteſtible proof of his merit.] The digeſting the numerous works of this elegant and excellent writer in their natural order is a work of no ſmall pains, as thoſe who have given the world his memoirs heretofore were very ſenſible, and for that reaſon never attempted it; yet that is not the cauſe of our mentioning it here, but a conſideration of quite a different nature, which is, that we may not be blamed for any deficiency or miſtake into which we may happen to fall through want of proper guides, in ſpite of all the care that we could poſſibly take; and, having premiſed this, we will proceed in our catalogue:

XV. "SYLVA; or, a Diſcourſe of Foreſt-trees, "and the Propagation of Timber in his Majeſty's "Dominions. As it was delivered in the Royal So"ciety the 15th of October, 1662, upon Occaſion of "certain Queries propounded to that illuſtrious Aſ"ſembly by the honourable the principal Officers and "Commiſſioners of the Navy. To which is annexed, "POMONA; or, an Appendix concerning Fruit-trees, "in relation to Cider, the making, and ſeveral "Ways of ordering it: publiſhed by expreſs Order "of the Royal Society. By John Evelyn, Eſq. "Fellow of the Royal Society." Lond. 1664, fol.

The bare Hiſtory of the editions of this moſt valuable work, the contents of which are too well known to ſtand in need of any account to be given of them here would be ſufficient to employ all the room that we have to ſpare. It was written by the command, it was publiſhed in virtue of an order, of the Royal Society, ſigned by the Lord Viſcount Brouncker, their Preſident, and dedicated to the King. The ſecond edition of it was publiſhed in 1669, with a new dedication to King Charles II, dated from Sayes-Court, Aug. 24. The firſt paragraph of which is ſo remarkable as to deſerve, in a great degree, the reader's notice. 'Sir, This 'ſecond edition of Sylva, after more than a thouſand 'copies had been bought up and diſperſed of the firſt 'impreſſion, in much leſs than two years ſpace (which 'Bookſellers aſſure us is a very extraordinary thing in 'volumes of this bulk), comes now again to pay its ho'mage to your Serene Majeſty, to whoſe auſpices alone 'it owes the favourable acceptance which it has re'ceived in the world. But it is not that alone which 'it preſumes to tell your Majeſty, but to acquaint you 'that it has been the ſole occaſion for furniſhing your 'almoſt exhauſted dominions with more, I dare ſay, 'than two millions of timber-trees, beſides infinite 'others, which have been propagated within the three 'nations at the inſtigation, and by the direction, of 'this work; and that the author of it is able, if need 'require, to make it out by a competent volume of 'letters and acknowledgments, which are come to his 'hands, from ſeveral perſons of the moſt eminent qua'lity, many of them illuſtrious, and divers of them 'unknown to him, in juſtification of what he aſſerts, 'which he the rather preſerves with the more care, 'becauſe they are teſtimonials from ſo many honour'able perſons of the benefit they have received from 'the endeavours of the Royal Society, which now-a'days paſſes through ſo many cenſures; but ſhe has 'yet your Majeſty for her Founder and Patron, and is 'therefore the leſs concerned, ſince no man of worth 'can lightly ſpeak ill of an Aſſembly, which your 'Majeſty has thought fit to dignify by ſo ſignal a re'lation to it.' There follows next a ſhort diſcourſe To the Reader, in which the occaſion, contents, and deſign, of the work, are declared; then a copy of Latin verſes by the learned Dr. Beale; to theſe ſucceed another copy of Latin verſes, written by R. Bohun, Eſq. and then a third in Greek, by John Evelyn, junior, Eſq. POMONA, which is but an Appendix, is, however, dedicated to that beſt of Miniſters, Thomas, Earl of Southampton, and Lord High Treaſurer of England. The third edition, with great additions and improvements, was publiſhed in 1670. The fourth edition in 1706, in which the Diſcourſe to the reader is very much enlarged, and every chapter of the work very conſiderably augmented. There was a fifth edition, with all the leſſer pieces of our author relating to agriculture and gardening, annexed, in 1729, all in folio; nor is there any reaſon to doubt its farther ſucceſs.

XVI. "A Parallel of the Antient Architecture with "the Modern, in a Collection of Ten principal "Authors, who have written upon the Five Orders, "viz Palladio and Scammozzi, Serlio and Vignola; "D. Barbaro and Cataneo; L. B. Alberti and Viola, "Bullant and De Lorme; compared with one ano"ther. The three Greek Orders, Doric, Ionic, and "Corinthian, compriſe the Firſt Part of this Treatiſe, "and the Two Latin, Tuſcan, and Compoſita, the "latter; written in French by Roland Freart, Sieur "de Chambray; made Engliſh for the Benefit of "Builders. To which is added, An Account of "Architects and Architecture, in an Hiſtorical and "Etymological Explanation of certain Terms, par"ticularly affected by Architects; with Leon Baptiſta "Alberti's Treatiſe of Statues. By John Evelyn, "Eſq. Fellow of the Royal Society." London, 1664, folio.

This work, as well as the former, is dedicated to King Charles the Second; and the Dedication, dated from Sayes-Court, Auguſt 20th. I will take the liberty of quoting ſome lines from it, not for the ſake of panegyrick, though in that no writer excelled our Author; but, upon the ſcore of the facts that are mentioned therein, which, there is a probability, might not otherwiſe fall in our reader's way. After an apology for prefixing his royal name to a tranſlation, our Author proceeds thus: 'I know none, indeed, to whom I could 'more aptly inſcribe a diſcourſe of Building than to ſo 'Royal a Builder, whoſe auguſt attempts have already 'given ſo great a ſplendour to our imperial city, and 'ſo illuſtrious an example to the nation! It is from 'this contemplation, Sir, that after I had, by the com'mands of the Royal Society, endeavoured the im'provement of timber and the planting of trees, I 'have advanced to that of Building, as its proper and 'mutual conſequent, not with a preſumption to incite 'or inſtruct your Majeſty, which were a vanity un'pardonable, but, by it, to take occaſion of celebra'ting your Majeſty's great example, who uſe your 'Empire and authority ſo worthily, as fortune 'ſeems to have conſulted her reaſon, when ſhe 'poured her favours upon you; ſo as I never caſt 'my there s nothing more natural than for men of true learning to preſerve a laſting regard and

' my eyes on that generous deſignation in the Epi-
' gram,

' ——Ut donem Paſtor & ædificem,

' without immediate reflection on your Majeſty, who
' ſeem only to value thoſe royal advantages you have
' above others, that you may oblige, and that ' you may build. And certainly, Sir, your Majeſty
' had conſulted the nobleſt way of eſtabliſhing your
' greatneſs, and of perpetuating your memory, ſince,
' whilſt ſtones can preſerve inſcriptions, your name
' will be famous to poſterity; and, when thoſe mate' rials fail, the benefits that are engraven in our hearts
' will outlaſt thoſe of marble. It will be no para' dox, but a truth, to affirm that your Majeſty has ' already built, and repaired, more in three or four ' years, notwithſtanding the difficulties and the neceſ-
' ſity of an extraordinary œconomy for the public
' concernment, than all your enemies have deſtroyed
' in twenty; nay, than all your Majeſty's predeceſ-
' ſors have advanced in an hundred, as I could eaſily
' make out, not only by what your Majeſty has ſo
' magnificently deſigned and carried on at that your
' antient honour of Greenwich, under the conduct of ' your moſt induſtrious and worthy ſurveyor, but in
' thoſe ſplendid apartments, and other uſeful reforma-
' tions for ſecurity and delight about your Majeſty's
' Palace, at Whitehall, the chargeable covering firſt
' then paving and reformation of Weſtminſter-Hall, care
' and preparation for rebuilding St. Paul's, by the impiety
' and iniquity of the late confuſions almoſt dilapidated,
' what her Majeſty the Queen-mother has added
' to her Palace at Somerſet-Houſe, in a ſtructure be' coming her royal grandeur, and the due veneration
' of all your Majeſty's ſubjects, for the honour ſhe
' has done both this your native city, and the whole
' nation. Nor may I here omit what I ſo much de-
' ſire to tranſmit to poſterity, thoſe noble and pro' fitable amænities of your Majeſty's plantations, where-
' in you moſt reſemble the divine Architect, becauſe
' your Majeſty has propoſed in it ſuch a pattern to ' your ſubjects, as merit their imitation and profoundeſt
' acknowledgments, in one of the moſt worthy and ' kingly improvements that nature is capable of. I ' know not what they talk of former ages, and of the
' now contemporary Princes with your Majeſty, theſe
' things are viſible: and ſhould I here deſcend to ' more particulars, which yet were not foreign to the ' ſubject of this diſcourſe, I would provoke the whole ' world to produce me an example parallel with your
' Majeſty, for your exact judgment and marvellous
' ability in all that belongs to the naval Architecture,
' both as to its proper terms and more ſolid uſe, in
' which your Majeſty is maſter of one of the moſt
' noble and profitable arts that can be wiſhed, in a
' Prince to whom God has deſigned the dominion of
' the ocean, which renders your Majeſty's empire
' univerſal; where, by exerciſing your royal talent
' and knowledge that way, you can bring even the ' Antipodes to meet, and the poles to kiſs each other;
' for ſo likewiſe, not in a metaphorical but natural
' ſenſe, your equal and prudent government of this ' nation has made it good, whilſt your Majeſty has
' ſo proſperouſly guided this giddy bark, through ſuch
' a ſtorm, as no hand, ſave your Majeſty's, could ' touch the helm, but at the price of their temerity.'

There is alſo another Dedication to Sir John Denham, Knight of the Bath, Superintendant and Surveyor of all his Majeſty's buildings and works, in which there are ſeveral matters of fact worth knowing, as indeed there are in all Mr. Evelyn's Dedications; for, though no man was naturally more civil, or more capable of making a compliment handſomely, yet his merit was always conſpicuous in his good manners; and he never thought that the ſwelling ſound of a well-turned period could atone for want of ſenſe. It appears from the Dedication of the ſecond edition of the Sylva to King Charles the Second, that there was a ſecond edition of this work alſo in the ſame year, viz. 1669, as there was a third in 1697, which was the laſt in the author's life-time, and therefore the laſt that I am obliged to mention. In this third edition, which is very much improved, "the account of Architects and "Architecture," which is an original work of Mr. Evelyn's, and a moſt excellent one of its kind, is dedicated to Sir Chriſtopher Wren, Surveyor to his Majeſty's buildings and works, and therein occurs a paſſage that concerns the perſonal hiſtory of our author ſo much, that it would be unpardonable in me to omit it. Having ſaid, in the firſt paragraph, that, if the whole art of building were loſt, it might be found again in the noble works of that great architect, which, though a very high, is no unjuſt compliment, more eſpecially, continues our author, St. Paul's Church and the Monument; he then adds, 'I have named
' St. Paul's, and truly not without admiration, as oft
' as I re-call to mind, as frequently I do, the ſad and ' deplorable condition it was in, when, after it had ' been made a ſtable of horſes and a den of thieves,
' you, with other gentlemen and myſelf, were, by the ' late King Charles, named Commiſſioners to ſurvey
' the dilapidations, and to make report to his Ma-
' jeſty, in order to a ſpeedy ſeparation. You will not,
' I am ſure, forget the ſtruggle we had with ſome
' who were for patching it up any how, ſo the
' ſteeple might ſtand, inſtead of new-building, which
' it altogether needed: when, to put an end to the ' conteſt, five days after (16), that dreadful confla- (16) Auguſt 27, Sept. 1666.
' gration happened, our of whoſe aſhes this phœnix
' is riſen, and was by providence deſigned for you.
' The circumſtance is too remarkable, that I could ' not paſs it over without notice. I will now add no ' more, but beg your pardon for this confidence of ' mine, after I have acquainted you that the parallel,
' to which this was annexed, being out of print, I was ' importuned by the bookſeller to add ſomething to ' a new impreſſion, but to which I was no way in' clined; till, not long ſince, going to St. Paul's to ' contemplate that auguſt pile, and the progreſs you
' have made, ſome of your chief workmen gratefully
' acknowledging the aſſiſtance it had afforded them, I
' took this opportunity of doing myſelf this honour.'

The fourth edition of this work, printed long after our author's death, viz. in 1733, was in folio, as well as the reſt; to which is added "the Elements of Ar-"chitecture, by Sir Henry Wotton, and ſome other things, of which, however, hints were met with in our author's pieces.

The ſecond edition of this book, which I take to have been in folio, and bound with the Sylva and Pomona, as I am ſure it was in the third edition, was dedicated to Abraham Cowley, Eſq. with great compliments from our Author, to that excellent and worthy perſon, to whom it had been communicated before, and affection for the academies where they first pursued their studies; so Mr. Evelyn gave a noble testimony of his high respect for that of Oxford, by using his utmost interest with the Lord Henry Howard, in order to prevail upon him to bestow the Arundelian marbles, then remaining in the garden of Arundel-house in the Strand (t), upon the university, in which he happily succeeded, and obtained, in consequence of it, all the reward he desired, which was the thanks of that learned body, delivered by delegates specially appointed for that purpose (u); which venerable monuments of Antiquity still remain at Oxford, and are now disposed in such a manner as contributes equally to ornament and use, where, while they continue to command the admiration of every intelligent spectator, they must, at the same time, perpetuate the remembrance of that zeal with which Mr. Evelyn exerted himself, in order to procure so proper as well as so magnificent an act of bounty, equally worthy of the Most Noble Person by whom it was bestowed, and of that most learned body upon whom it was bestowed (w) [M]. This was far from being the last favour conferred by that noble person, at the request of Mr. Evelyn, whom he honoured with his friendship, in the most entire degree, after he arrived at the title of Norfolk; as, on the other hand, Mr. Evelyn made no other advantage of his kindness towards him than giving a right direction to the natural generosity of that excellent person, whence flowed some particular marks of kindness to the Royal Society, which were very gratefully accepted; and something farther would have been procured, if the sudden and unexpected death of that great and good man (x) had not frustrated the schemes formed by our author for the service of that learned society, to which, from its very foundation, he was attached with a zeal, which, however warm, never felt any decay [N]. Mr. Evelyn spent his time, at this juncture, in a manner as pleasing as he could wish. He had great credit at Court, and great reputation in the world; was one of the Commissioners for rebuilding St. Paul's (y), attended the meetings of the Royal Society with great regularity, undertook readily whatever tasks were assigned him to support that reputation, which, from their first institution, they had acquired, and which, by degrees, triumphed over that envy which it raised. He was punctual in the discharge of his office as before, which occasioned Mr. Cowley's addressing to John Evelyn, Esq. his mixt essay in verse and prose, entitled, "The Garden," which has been always admired as one of the finest pieces that fell from the pen of that illustrious poet. We should next inform our reader of the several editions this curious and useful work has gone through; but, the truth is, we have it not in our power, the editions of it being long ago out of number: the last (at least that we know of) of which any account was kept, was the ninth; since that, it is said in the title page, a new edition. The Author made many additions as long as he lived, so that the best was that printed by way of Appendix to the fourth and last edition of the Sylva in his life-time, which is also, in the fifth edition of that work, printed after his decease. We have had many Kalendars since, some better and some worse; but it was easy to write after so fair an original, which, in method and form, as well as matter, is very elegant and concise, and withal very plain, suited exactly to the capacities of those for whose use it was designed.

[M] Upon whom it was bestowed.] These historical marbles, brought chiefly from the island of Pharos, and containing the most antient and authentic inscriptions, relative to the State of Athens, were, at an immense expence, purchased and brought into England by Thomas Earl of Arundel, to whom our Author, Mr. Evelyn, was well known in Italy, and were placed in the garden of his Palace without Temple-Bar; they were afterwards, as the reader has seen in the text, removed to Oxford, and are at present fixed on the outward wall of the Theatre, marked with the letter (H), to distinguish them from other antiquities of the same kind, and which are placed there likewise, that were bestowed upon the University by the learned Selden (18). As a farther mark of the gratitude of that learned body, the following inscription is placed under the arms of the noble family of Howard. 'Æternæ Memoriæ excellentissimi Dni. Domini 'Henrici Howard de Castle Reising, Fratris & Hære- 'dis Thomæ Howard Ducis Norfolciæ, a prosapiâ 'regiâ primi Comitis Angliæ, Comitis Surreiæ, Do- 'mini & Baronis de Howard, Domini & Baronis Mow- 'bray, Seagrave, Brewes de Gower, Fitzallen, Clun, Of- 'waldstree, Maltrevers, & Greystoke, ad Muley Urshed 'Marociensem Imperatorem Legati. Ob Marmora 'hæc Arundelianorum nomine per totum orbem ce- 'leberrima, avi sui Thomæ Arundeliæ Comitis, su- 'premi Angliæ Marescalli, summique artium libera- 'lium patroni, sumptibus & sollicitudine ingentibus, 'ab Ottomanicâ Barbarie vindicata, & in Pallatium 'gentilitium Londini pridem traducta, ab ipso dein 'donata, gratabunda, posuit Universitas Oxonienses:' that is, 'To the perpetual memory of that most ex- 'cellent Nobleman, Henry Lord Howard, of Castle 'Reising, Brother and Heir of Thomas Howard, 'Duke of Norfolk, allied to the Royal Line, the first 'Duke of England, Earl of Arundel, and Primier 'Earl of England; Earl of Surrey, Baron of Howard; 'and also Baron Mowbray, Seagrave, Brewes de 'Gower, Fitzallen, Clun, Oswaldstree, Maltrevers, 'and Greystoke, Embassador to Muley Urshed, Em- 'peror of Morocco: on account of these stiled Arun- 'delian Marbles, celebrated throughout the world, 'by his uncle Thomas Earl of Arundel, Earl Marshal 'of England, and the great Patron of the liberal Arts, 'with immense care and expence, rescued from the 'barbarous Turks, and first brought to his Palace in 'London, and at length generously bestowed upon 'her, the University of Oxford gratefully inscribed 'this stone.'

(18) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 28.

[N] Which, however warm, never felt any decay.] This noble person was the son of Henry Earl of Arundel, and younger brother to Thomas Earl of Arundel and Surrey, who was, immediately after the Restoration, restored to the title of Duke of Norfolk. About the same time this noble person was created Baron Howard, of Castle Rising, in the County of Norfolk; in 1672, he was created Earl of Norwich, and Earl Marshal of England; in 1678, he succeeded his brother in the title of Duke of Norfolk; and in 1683, he died at his house in Arundel-Street (19). His friendship for Mr. Evelyn began early, and lasted, without interruption, so long as they lived; as appears from a solemn memorial of his gratitude, on the part of Mr. Evelyn (20), besides several occasional testimonies of deep respect in his works. It was at the request of Mr. Evelyn, that his Grace gave several testimonies of regard to the Royal Society, and bestowed upon them the Arundel Library, which was a curious and valuable collection (21). He likewise intended to have given a most noble statue of Minerva to the University of Oxford, but his unexpected death prevented Mr. Evelyn from getting it timely removed (22).

[O] By his former writings.] It is a point of juſtice, due to the merit and memory of our Author, to remark, that, though he wrote ſo much, and publiſhed ſo many books upon ſuch a diverſity of ſubjects, yet is there none of them that carries any mark of haſte or negligence. On the contrary, they appear all of them to have coſt much ſtudy and attention, and to perform more than is promiſed by their titles; ſome inſtances of which will appear in this note.

XIX. "The Hiſtory of the Three late famous "Impoſtors, viz. Padre Ottomano, pretended Son "and Heir to the late Grand Signior; Mahomet Bei, "a pretended Prince of the Ottoman Family, but, in "truth, a Wallachian Counterfeit; and Sabbatai "Sevi, the ſuppoſed Meſſiah of the Jews, in the "Year 1666; with a brief Account of the Ground "and Occaſion of the preſent War between the Turk "and the Venetian: Together with the Cauſe of the "final Extirpation, Deſtruction, and Exile, of the "Jews out of the Empire of Perſia." Lond. 1668, 8vo.

This piece is dedicated to Henry Earl of Arlington, and, as I before obſerved, that Mr. Evelyn's Dedications are filled with curious facts, rather than a crowd of compliments; ſo, by giving him this, I ſhall at once juſtify that obſervation, and gratify his curioſity as to the contents of a book that is now become very ſcarce; it runs thus:

'My Lord,

'THESE enſuing diſcourſes entitle their original 'to the noble induſtry and affection to truth of an 'illuſtrious perſon, and to the great and worthy in'genuity of a Perſian ſtranger, lately amongſt us, 'from whoſe mouth I have received the two fol'lowing firſt narrations, and from whom I have been 'abundantly ſatisfied, that the particulars are of un'doubted verity. For the third and laſt, which con'cerns the ſtory of that impudent Jew, it will need 'little apology, ſince it proceeds not only from an 'eye-witneſs, but from the hand of a perſon who has 'already gratified the public with the fruit of many 'rare and excellent obſervations, and which becomes 'due to your Lordſhip upon a juſt claim; ſo as your 'Lordſhip, having been ſo pleaſed with the firſt rela'tion, cannot be leſs with the following; though I 'ſhould never have preſumed to be their deferent in 'this unpoliſhed dreſs, had I not received ſome aſſu'rances of your pardon.

'It will doubtleſs appear very ſtrange, that impoſ'tures of this magnitude ſhould ſo long abuſe the 'world, were there no other intereſt in it than the 'vanity of the perſons who aſſume to themſelves the 'titles. Whatever the reaſon of it be, here we have 'matter of fact; and it was more than time the world 'ſhould be at laſt diſabuſed, which has been ſo long 'impoſed on, and even laboured under the common 'miſtake, That the cauſe of this obſtinate war and 'quarrel, 'twixt the Turk and the Venetian, was 'grounded only upon the taking Sultan Oſman and his 'mother, pretended ſon and wife of Sultan Ibrahim, 'by the galleys of Malta. This was, my Lord, the 'believed report at my being at Venice the very year 'this action fortuned, and it has ſince gained credit, 'and filled our ears, and all the Hiſtories of this age, 'as a thing unqueſtionable: but, with what pretence 'of truth, theſe papers will both inform your Lord'ſhip, and give day to ſome other paſſages worthy the 'notice of inquiſitive men, and of a conjuncture ſo 'ſeaſonable for it, while the eyes and thoughts of all 'Europe are intent upon the ſucceſs of Candia. What 'concerns the Wallachian vagrant will be a ſervice 'both to his Majeſty and other Chriſtian Princes, 'whom this bold impoſtor has had the front to abuſe, 'but, eripitur perſona, the maſk is now off, and I 'have no more to add than that of being, &c.

This Dedication is ſubſcribed J. E. and certainly, if Mr. Wood had ſeen it, he would not have ſaid as he does, "I know nothing yet to the contrary but this "may be a tranſlation (23)." The nature and value of this little piece was much better known abroad, one of the beſt received Literary Journals extant having given, though at ſome diſtance of time, a very juſt character of it (24), with this very remarkable circumſtance, that the pretended Mahomet Bei was at that very juncture in the city of Leipſick. There is added, at the end of this piece, an account of the extirpation of the Jews in Perſia, during the reign of Shah Abbas the Second, which is not ſo large or perfect as the reſt; but then the author gives a hint of this, and does not preſs any thing farther than is ſupported by authorities. He mentions a perſon, who, the very year that the book was publiſhed, took upon him the title of brother to the famous Count Serini, and that he had the misfortune to be ſhipwrecked in the Weſt of England (25), by which he impoſed upon perſons of quality, till, by unluckily calling for drink upon the road in very audible Engliſh, he diſcovered the cheat, and was obliged to renounce his new dignity to avoid Bridewell. He farther remarks, with reſpect to Sabatai Sevi, that he was the twenty-fifth falſe Meſſiah that had attempted to impoſe upon the Jews, even according to their own account.

XX. "Public Employment, and an active Life "preferred to Solitude, in a Reply to a late ingeni"ous Eſſay of a contrary title." Lond. 1667, in 8vo. This was written, in anſwer to a diſcourſe of Sir George Mackenzie's, preferring ſolitude to public employment, which was at the time of its publication much admired; and, as our author apprehended this might prove an encouragement to indolence and timidity, he therefore wrote againſt it. We have in the Tranſactions of the Royal Society a character of this, and the piece before mentioned, which follows the account given of the ſecond edition of the "Sylva," and is worthy the reader's peruſal (26). 'Beſides 'other treatiſes which are anonymous, ſays this ac'count, as being of a reſerved nature, but are, ne'verthleſs, entirely for the honour of the King and 'this kingdom, and generally for the good of all 'men, he hath lately made two conſiderable excur'ſions, in one of which tracts, for a caution of all 'future ages, and to denote the general aptneſs of 'mankind to be deluded and deceived, he hath pub'liſhed a well-grounded hiſtory of the three late fa'mous impoſtors, the firſt merely caſual and inno'cent, in Padre Ottomanno; the ſecond, bold and 'impudent, in Mahomet Bei; the third, a confident 'cheat, in Sabbatai Sevi, the Jews counterfeit Meſ'ſias: in the other tract, "public employment and 'an active life are preferred to ſolitude." Thus he, 'and other generous perſons, can, in the crowd of 'public buſineſs, find or make leiſure to oblige all 'men; whilſt moroſe ſchoolmen and narrow critics 'make it their main buſineſs to outgo Satan in their 'falſe accuſations, diſingenuous ſurmiſes, and immo'deſt diſturbances of the nobleſt endeavours and at'chievements.'

of July, he was honoured with the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law, as a mark of the gratitude of that learned body (a), and of the juſt ſenſe they had of the credit derived to them from his being educated at Baliol-College. It was, indeed, a ſingular point of Mr. Evelyn's felicity, that all the honours he obtained, and all the poſts to which he was raiſed, were the mere rewards of his merit, and beſtowed upon him without the leaſt ſolicitation. Thus, after King Charles II. had tried, with very little effect, to promote trade, according to the advice of perſons engaged therein (b), when he thought proper to conſtitute a particular Board for that purpoſe, and named ſeveral perſons of great rank to be members of that Council, he likewiſe appointed Mr. Evelyn amongſt thoſe that were recommended purely to that honour by their abilities (c). This preferment was ſo welcome to a perſon of his diſintereſted temper and true public ſpirit,

" amples conformable to the Obſervations, which " Pliny and Quintilian have made upon the moſt " celebrated Pieces of the antient Painters, paralleled " with ſome Works of the moſt famous modern Pain- " ters, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Julio Romano, " and N. Pouſſin. Written in French by Roland " Freart, Sieur de Cambray, and rendered Engliſh by " J. E. Eſquire, Fellow of the Royal Society." Lond. 1668, 8vo. This tranſlation is dedicated to Henry Howard, of Norfolk, heir apparent to that Dukedom; and the dedication is dated from Sayes-Court, June the 24th, 1668, 8vo. In the preface, he obſerves, that the reader will find, in this diſcourſe, divers uſeful remarks, eſpecially, where the author 'treats of 'Coſtume (27), which we, continues he, have interpreted Decorum, as the neareſt expreſſion our language will bear to it. And, I was glad our author had reproved it, in ſo many inſtances, becauſe, it not only grows daily more licentious, but even ridiculous and intolerable. But, it is hoped, this may univerſally be reformed, when our modern workmen ſhall conſider, that neither the exactneſs of their deſign, nor ſkilfulneſs in colouring, has been able to defend their greateſt predeceſſors from juſt reproaches, who have been faulty in this particular. I could exemplify in many others, whom our author has omitted; and there is none but takes notice what injury it has done the fame of ſome of our beſt reputed painters, and how indecorous it is to introduce circumſtances, wholly improper to the uſages and genius of the places, where our hiſtories are ſuppoſed to have been acted.' Mr. Evelyn then remarks, that this was not only the fault of Baſſano, who would be ever bringing in his wife, children, and ſervants, his dog and his cat, and very kitchen-ſtuff, after the Paduan mode; but of the great Titian himſelf, Georgion, Tintoret, and the reſt; as Paulo Veroneſe is obſerved alſo to have done in his ſtory of Pharaoh's daughter drawing Moſes out of the river, attended with a guard of Swiſſes. Malvogius likewiſe, in a picture then in the King's gallery at Whitehall, not only repreſents our firſt parents with navels upon their bellies, but has placed an artificial ſtone fountain, carved with imagery, in the midſt of his Paradiſe. Nor does that excellent and learned painter, Rubens, eſcape without cenſure, not only for making moſt of his figures of the ſhapes of brawny Flemings, but for other ſphalmata, and circumſtances of the like nature, though, in ſome, he has acquitted himſelf to admiration, in the due obſervation of Coſtume, particularly in his crucifixes, &c. Raphael Urbino was, doubtleſs, one of the firſt who reformed theſe inadvertencies, but it was more conſpicuous in his latter than in his former pieces. 'As for Michael Angelo, continues Mr. 'Evelyn, though I heartily conſent with our critic in 'reproving that almoſt idolatrous veneration of his 'works, who hath certainly prodigiouſly abuſed the 'art, not only in the table this diſcourſe arraigns him 'for, but ſeveral more which I have ſeen, yet I con'ceive he might have omitted ſome of thoſe imbit'tered reproaches he has reviled him with, who, 'doubtleſs, was one of the greateſt maſters of his time, 'and, however he might ſucceed as to the decorum, 'was hardly exceeded for what he performed in 'ſculpture, and the ſtatuary art, by many even of the 'ancients themſelves, and haply by none of the mo'derns, witneſs his Moſes, Chriſtus in Gremio, and 'ſeveral other figures at Rome, to ſay nothing of his 'talent in architecture, and the obligation the world 'has to his memory, for recovering many of its moſt 'uſeful ornaments and members out of the neglected 'fragments, which lay ſo long buried, and for vindi'cating that antique and magnificent manner of build'ing from the trifling of Goths and Barbarians.' He obſerves next, that the uſual reproach of painting has been the want of judgment in perſpective, and bringing more into hiſtory than is juſtifiable upon one aſpect, without turning the eye to each figure in particular, and multiplying the points of ſight, which is a point even Monſieur Freart, for all the pains he has taken to magnify that celebrated deciſion of Paris, has failed in. For, the knowing in that art eaſily perceive, that even Raphael himſelf has not ſo exactly obſerved it, ſince, inſtead of one, as Monſieur Freart takes it to be, and, as indeed it ought to have been, there are no leſs than four or five, as du Boſſe hath well obſerved in his treatiſe of " The converted Painter," where, by the way alſo, he judiciouſly numbers, amongſt the faults againſt Coſtume, thoſe landſcapes, groteſque figures, &c. which we frequently find abroad eſpecially; for, in our country; we have few or none of thoſe graceful ſupplements of ſteeples painted, horizontally and vertically on the vaults and cielings of cupolas, ſince we have no examples for it from the ancients, who allowed no more than a frett to the moſt magnificent and coſtly of thoſe which they erected. But, would you know whence this univerſal caution in moſt of their works proceeded, and that the beſt of our modern painters and architects have ſucceeded better than others of that profeſſion, it muſt be conſidered, that they were learned men, good hiſtorians, and generally ſkilled in the beſt antiquities; ſuch were Raphael, and doubtleſs his ſcholar Julio; and, if Polydore arrived not to the glory of letters, he yet attained to a rare habit of the antient guſto, as may be interpreted from moſt of his deſigns and paintings. Leon Baptiſt Alberti was ſkilled in all the politer parts of learning to a prodigy, and has written ſeveral curious things in the Latin tongue. We know that of later times, Rubens was a perſon univerſally learned, as may be ſeen in ſeveral Latin epiſtles of his to the greateſt ſcholars of his age. And Nicolas Pouſſin, the Frenchman, who is ſo much celebrated and ſo deſervedly, did, it ſeems, arrive to this by his indefatigable induſtry, 'as the preſent famous ſtatuary, Bernini, 'now living, ſays Mr. Evelin, has alſo done ſo uni'verſal a maſtery, that, not many years ſince, he is re'ported to have built a theatre at Rome, for the 'adornment whereof, he not only cut the figures and 'painted the ſcenes, but wrote the play, and com'poſed the muſick, which was all in recitativo. And 'I am perſuaded, that all this is not yet by far—ſo 'much as that miracle and ornament of our age and 'country, Dr. Chriſtopher Wren, were able to per'form, if he were ſo diſpoſed, and ſo encouraged, 'becauſe he is maſter of ſo many admirable advan'tages beyond them. I allege theſe examples partly 'to incite, and partly to ſhew the dignity and vaſt 'comprehenſion of this rare art, and that for a man 'to arrive to its utmoſt perfection, he ſhould be al'moſt as univerſal as the Orator in Cicero, and the 'Architect in Vitruvius. But, certainly, ſome tincture 'in Hiſtory, the Opticks and Anatomy, are abſolutely 'requiſite, and more, in the opinion of our author, 'than to be a ſteady Deſigner, and ſkilled in the tem'pering and applying of colours, which, amongſt moſt 'of our modern workmen, go now for the only accom'pliſhments of a painter.'

(27) This piece is now become exceeding ſcarce, and is very much admired by the lovers of Painting.

that he thought he could not expreſs his gratitude better than by digeſting, in a ſhort and plain diſcourſe, the chief heads of the Hiſtory of Trade and Navigation, which he accordingly did, and dedicated that ſmall piece to the King, which was very graciouſly received, and is allowed to contain as much matter in as ſmall a compaſs as any that was ever written upon a topick ſo copious as well as ſo important (d) [P]. As this promotion not only opened the means, but alſo required the employing many of his hours in the ſervice of his country, it naturally diverted him in ſome meaſure from his ſtudies; but, notwithſtanding this, when the Royal Society (e) found it requiſite to demand the aſſiſtance of ſome of its principal Members, and to exact from them the tribute of certain diſſertations upon weighty and philoſophical ſubjects, he did not plead either his age or his avocations in excuſe, but chearfully and vigorouſly ſet about the taſk that was aſſigned him, and performed it as happily as the Society or himſelf could wiſh, as the reader will learn at the bottom of the page [Q]. Theſe were all the preferments

[P] As well as important.] We have in the text ſhewn the occaſion and ground of this treatiſe, which from its brevity deſerves not the name of a book ſo much as of a pamphlet. The title at large runs thus:

XXII. "Navigation and Commerce, their Original "and Progreſs, containing a ſuccinct Account of "Traffic in general, its Benefits and Improvements, "of Diſcoveries, Wars, and Conflicts at Sea, from "the Original of Navigation to this Day, with "ſpecial Regard to the Engliſh Nation, their ſeveral "Voyages and Expeditions to the Beginning of our "late Difference with Holland, in which his Majeſty's "Title to the Dominion of the ſea is aſſerted, againſt "the novel and later Pretenders. By J. Evelyn, "Eſq. F. R. S." Lond. 1674. 8vo.

There is a dedication prefixed to the King, in which he takes notice of that relation in which he ſtood by his new office to his Majeſty, which gave him the boldneſs to bring ſo inconſiderable an offering into his preſence. There is alſo a very ſuccinct account of it, in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions" (28); and the truth is, that moſt people, comparing the pompous title-page with the diminutive ſize of the book, have thence formed a concluſion to its diſadvantage; and, conſequently, in ſome degree to the diſcredit of its author. But, whoever examines it narrowly, and weighs every part of it with due conſideration, will, if I miſtake not highly, entertain a different notion of this diſcourſe, and think it at leaſt equal to any thing we have of this gentleman's writing, which, ſo long as uſeful learning is eſteemed and the Engliſh language underſtood, will be thought no mean character. In order to have a right notion of it, we muſt firſt of all reflect on the Author's deſign in writing it; the nature and copiouſneſs of the ſubject, and the perſons for whoſe uſe it was principally intended. As to Mr. Evelyn's deſign, it was plainly this: to digeſt into as narrow a compaſs as poſſible, in the cleareſt method and in the moſt flowing language, the Hiſtory of Commerce and Navigation in general, of thoſe of England in particular, and of the rights of the Britiſh Crown to the dominion of the ſea. Theſe were ſubjects equally important and extenſive, but it was by no means his inclination to treat them in a full, or in a ſcientific manner, though this ſhort treatiſe is an abundant proof, that no man living was more capable of doing it, if that had been his view. But the truth is, he meant only to ſkim the cream, and to repreſent as ſuccinctly and fairly as poſſible, the ſtrongeſt and moſt intereſting motives to make theſe ſubjects the ſtudy of thoſe whom it moſt concerns: the nation ſhould have them in their heads and at their hearts. In ſhort, he meant it as a ſort of brief introduction for the uſe of thoſe noble and great perſonages, whom the King, for the honour of that board, had thought fit to aſſociate with him in this commiſſion (29). It was neceſſary, to fix their attention that the title ſhould promiſe much; it was no leſs requiſite, to ſecure a reading, that the piece ſhould be very ſhort. Take it in this light, it will appear inſtead of a ſuperficial a very wonderful performance; for, it comprehends in little more than a hundred pages, an univerſal hiſtory of theſe matters from the origin of trade down to that time; and, upon a ſtrict review, it will be found that every material point is touched therein, and this at once in ſo ſprightly and judicious a manner as to excite a deſire, in the ingenious and inquiſitive reader, to ſearch the ſeveral topicks to the bottom; and, for their aſſiſtance in this reſpect, the beſt and moſt authentic authors are indicated throughout; and, though the treatiſe is ſo ſmall, yet there is an accurate index or table at the end, the ſlighteſt review of which will plainly demonſtrate the truth of all that I have ſaid. Upon the whole, inſtead of cenſuring Mr. Evelyn for publiſhing ſo trite a pamphlet upon affairs of ſuch national concern, we ought rather to applaud him for having reduced into an hour's reading, with much more labour to himſelf than if he had written a great book, things of ſo much moment, and add to it our wiſhes, that ſome judicious perſon would make his learned diſſertation the text, and within the compaſs of a moderate Quarto, illuſtrate, by proper notes, ſo excellent an abridgment of all that is requiſite to be known upon matters that will never loſe their uſe, and which import this nation more than any other, to which nothing can contribute ſo much as their being fully explained.

(29) It was in thoſe days known to have anſwered the author's aim very effectually.

[Q] At the bottom of the page.] The title of this learned diſcourſe, which will be ever eſteemed, and has been often re-printed, runs thus:

XXIII. "Terra: A Philoſophical Diſcourſe of "Earth, relating to the Culture and Improvement of "it for Vegetation, and the Propagation of Plants, "&c. as it was preſented to the Royal Society, "April 29th, 1675. By J. Evelyn, Eſq. F. R. S." Lond. 1675. fol. and 8vo.

There is, prefixed to this diſcourſe, a letter from the Lord Viſcount Brouncker, Preſident of the Royal Society, and our Author's anſwer. As theſe are very ſhort, and altogether hiſtorical, we will give them to the reader, and refer him to the Philoſophical Tranſactions, for a ſhort, full, and accurate, account of the work (30).—His Lordſhip's letter runs thus— 'Sir, 'the Council of the Royal Society, conſidering with 'themſelves the great importance of having the public meeting of the ſaid Society conſtantly provided 'with entertainments ſuitable to the deſign of their 'inſtitution, have thought fit to undertake to contribute each of them one, not doubting, but that many 'of the Fellows of the Society will join with them 'in carrying on ſuch an undertaking; and, being well 'perſuaded of your approbation of this their purpoſe, 'ſo much tending to the reputation and ſupport of 'the ſociety, they deſire that you will be pleaſed to 'undertake for one, and to name any Thurſday after 'the fourteenth of January next, ſuch as ſhall be 'moſt convenient for you, when you will preſent the 'ſociety at one of their public meetings by yourſelf, 'or ſome other of the Fellows for you, with ſuch a 'diſcourſe grounded upon, or leading to, philoſophical experiments on a ſubject of your own choice: 'in doing of which you will benefit the ſociety, and 'oblige, Sir, &c.'

ferments he met with in that reign; and, though they were none of them very conſiderable in reſpect of profit, yet they ſeem to have given him perfect content; and he was ſo eaſy in his own circumſtances, ſo good an œconomiſt, and ſo true a Patriot, that while he daily ſaw freſh improvements made in every county throughout the kingdom, and the commerce of the nation continually extended, he thought himſelf perfectly happy, and never failed to expreſs his ſentiments in that reſpect with all the warmth and freedom imaginable. The ſevere winter of 1683 gave ſome interruption to his domeſtic enjoyments, the froſt committing dreadful depredations in his fine gardens at Sayes-Court, of which he ſent a full and very pathetic account to the Royal Society in the beginning of the ſucceeding ſpring (f) [R]. After the acceſſion of King James, we find him, in December, (f) Philoſ. Tranſ. No. 158.

Mr. Evelyn's anſwer runs thus.

'My Lord,

'I have, in obedience to your Lordſhip, and the 'irreſiſtible ſuffrages of that ſociety over which you 'preſide, reſigned the papers to be diſpoſed of as you 'think fit: I hear your Lordſhip's ſentence is, they 'ſhould be made public. Why ſhould not a thouſand 'things, of infinitely more value, daily enriching 'their collection, and which would better juſtify the 'laudable progreſs of that aſſembly, be oftner pro'duced as ſome of late have been? This, my Lord, 'would obviate all unkind objections, and cover the 'infirmities of the preſent diſcourſe with things in'deed worthy our inſtitution. But, as I am to obey 'your Lordſhip's commands, ſo both your Lordſhip 'and the ſociety are accountable for publiſhing the 'imperfection of, my Lord, &c.'

As theſe letters fully declare the occaſion and nature of this diſcourſe, as well as the means of its being made public, we may reſt ſatisfied, that, notwithſtanding the great modeſty of Mr. Evelyn, this paſt, in the opinion of the ſociety, for a very extraordinary performance, otherwiſe they would never have cauſed it to be publiſhed, much leſs in the manner they did; nor is it leſs certain, that it every way anſwered their intention, it being univerſally well received abroad, as well as at home, and excited a juſt eſteem for that learned body.

[R] Of the ſucceeding ſpring.] It is a thing univerſally known, and by ſome ſtill remembered, that the winter of 1683 was the coldeſt of any, the ſignal effects of which have been recorded by credible authors. Mr. Evelyn's letter, therefore, is a very great curioſity. It is dated from Sayes-Court, Deptford, April 14, 1684, and, excluſive of an admirable hiſtory, contains, in a very narrow compaſs, a multitude of uſeful remarks, as well as entertaining particulars. 'As to 'timber-trees, ſays he, I have not many here of any 'conſiderable age or ſtature, except a few elms, which 'having been decaying many years, one cannot well 'find to have received any freſh wounds, diſtinguiſh'able from old cracks and hollowneſſes; and, indeed, 'I am told by divers, that elms have not ſuffered as 'the great oaks have done, nor do I find, amongſt in'numerable of that ſpecies (elms) which I have planted, 'and that are now about twenty-five and thirty years 'ſtanding, any of them touched. The ſame I ob'ſerve of limes, walnuts, aſh, beech, hornbeams, 'birch, cheſnut, and other foreſters: but, as I ſaid, 'mine are young comparatively, and yet, one would 'think, that ſhould leſs protect them, becauſe more 'tender, ſo as it ſeems the rifting ſo much complained 'of has happened chiefly among the over-grown trees, 'eſpecially oaks. My Lord Weymouth made his la'mentation to me, and ſo have the Earl of Cheſterfield, 'Lord Ferrors, Sir William Fermor, and others con'cerned in the ſame calamity, which I mention be'cauſe of their diſtant habitations. But, if rightly I 'remember, one of theſe noble perſons lately told me, 'that, ſince the thaw, the trees which were exceed'ingly ſplit, were come together and cloſed again, and 'I eaſily believe it; but, that they are really as ſolid 'as before, I doubt will not appear when they ſhall 'come to be examined by the axe, and converted to 'uſe: nor has this accident happened only to ſtanding 'timber, but to that which has been felled and ſea'ſoned, as Mr. Shiſh, the Maſter-Builder in his Ma'jeſty's ſhip-yard here, informed me. So much for 'our indigenæ.

'As for exotics, I fear my cork-trees will hardly 'recover; but the ſpring is yet ſo very backward, 'even in this warm and dry ſpot of mine, that I can'not pronounce any thing poſitively, eſpecially of 'ſuch whoſe bark is very thick and rugged, ſuch as is 'the cork, enzina, and divers of the reſinous trees. 'The Conſtantinopolitan or horſe-cheſnut is turgid 'with buds, and ready to explain its leaf. My cedars 'I think are loſt; the ilex and ſcarlet oak, not ſo; 'the arbutus, doubtful; and ſo are bays, but ſome 'will eſcape, and moſt of them repullulate and ſpring 'afreſh, if cut down near the earth at the latter end of 'the month. The Scotch fir-ſpruce, and white Spa'niſh, which laſt uſes to ſuffer in their tender buds by 'the ſpring froſts, have received no damage this win'ter. I cannot ſay the ſame of the pine which bears 'the greater cone; but other Norways and pinaſters 'are freſh; laurel is only diſcoloured, and ſome of the 'woody branches mortified, which being cut to the 'quick will ſoon put forth again, it being a ſucculent 'plant. Amongſt our ſhrubs, roſemary is entirely loſt; 'and to my great ſorrow, becauſe I had not only 'beautiful hedges of it, but ſufficient to afford me 'flowers for the making a very conſiderable quantity 'of the Queen of Hungary's celebrated water: ſo uni'verſal, I fear, is the deſtruction of this excellent plant, 'not only over England, but our neighbour countries 'more ſouthward, that we muſt raiſe our next hopes 'from the ſeed. Halimus, or ſea-purſelan, of which 'I had a pretty hedge, is alſo periſhed; and ſo ano'ther of French furzes. The cypreſs are all of them 'ſcorched, and ſome to death, eſpecially ſuch as were 'kept ſhorn in pyramids; but amongſt great numbers 'there will divers eſcape, after they are well chaſtiſed, 'that is, with a tough hazel or other wand to beat off 'their dead and duſty leaves, which growing much 'cloſer than other ſhrubs, hinder the air and dews from 'refreſhing the interior parts. This diſcipline I uſe 'to all my tonſile ſhrubs, with good ſucceſs, as oft as 'winter parches them.

'The berry-bearing ſavine, which, if well under'ſtood and cultivated, were the only beſt ſuccedaneum 'to cypreſs, has not ſuffered in the leaſt: it perfectly 'reſembles the cypreſs, and grows very tall and thick. 'I think the arbor thuya is alive, and ſo is the Ameri'can acaia, acanthus, paliurus, pomgranad; my lauruſ'tinus looks ſuſpicioully: ſome large and old alaturnuſes 'are killed, eſpecially ſuch as were more expoſed to 'the ſun, whereas thoſe that grow in the ſhade eſcape; 'the reaſon of which, I conjecture to be from the re'ciprocations of being ſomewhat relaxed every day, 'and then made rigid and ſtiff again all night; which 'bending and unbending, ſo often opening and cloſing 'the parts, does exceedingly mortify them and all 'other tender plants, which, growing in ſhady places, 'undergo but one thaw and change. Moſt of theſe 'will yet arrive again at the root, being cut cloſe to 'the ground: the phillyreas anguſti, and ſerratifolios, 'both of them incomparably the beſt for ornamental 'hedges of any the perennial greens I know, have 'hardly been ſenſible of the leaſt impreſſion, more 'than tarniſhing of their leaves; no more have the 'Spaniſh jaſmines and Perſians; and I enumerate 'theſe particulars the more minutely, that gentlemen, 'who are curious, may take notice what plants they may 'truſt to abroad in all events, for I ſpeak only of ſuch as 'are expoſed.

'As for the choicer rarities, which are ſet in for 'hyemation, they certainly eſcape, or are impaired, ac'cordingly as they are treated by the more or leſs ex'perienced and induſtrious gardener, or commodiouſ-

December, 1685, appointed, with the Lord Viſcount Tiviot of the kingdom of Scotland, and Colonel Robert Philips, one of the Commiſſioners for executing the great office of Lord Privy-Seal, in the abſence of Henry Earl of Clarendon, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which he held till March 11, 1686, when the King was pleaſed to make Henry Baron Arundel of Wardour Lord Privy-Seal (g). He wrote nothing under this reign at all. After the Revolution, he was Treaſurer of Greenwich Hoſpital, and, though he was then much in years, yet he wrote ſome and tranſlated other pieces, amongſt which we are to reckon that labour of his, which has been ſo highly commended by the beſt judges, and which will do laſting honour to his country (h) [S]. One would have imagined

'neſs of the conſervatory; but to ſay what may be 'added on this ſubject would require a large chapter, 'not a letter. I would in the mean time adviſe ſuch as 'have ſuffered detriment in their green-houſes not to 'deſpair, when they ſee the leaves of their myrtles, 'oranges, oleanders, jaſmines, and other precious 'ſhrubs, ruſſet, or altogether, ſhrivelled and falling; 'but to cut them to the quick, plaſter the wounds, 'and plunge their caſes and pots, trimmed with freſh 'mould, &c. in a warm bed, carefully refreſhed, 'ſhaded, aired, and treated as ſick patients, and as 'the prudent gardener beſt knows how: but, above all, 'that he be ſure not to expoſe them till theſe eaſtern 'winds (which I call our Engliſh Eteſians, and which 'makes our ſprings ſo uncomfortable, when we think 'Winter and all danger paſt) be qualified; for, they 'are deadly to all our plants abroad, and frequently 'do us more prejudice than the moſt churliſh winters, 'as commonly finiſhing the deſtruction of what the 'froſts have ſpared; nor are we to be flattered with a 'warm day or two, which are apt to tempt gardeners 'to ſet out their plants before the end of April, or that 'we find the wiſe mulberry put forth, which is cer-'tainly the moſt faithful monitor; nor ſhould we in-'deed cut or tranſplant any of the perennials, till of 'themſelves they begin to ſprout.

'I need ſay nothing of holly, yew, box, juniper, '&c. hardy and ſpontaneous to our country; and yet, 'to my grief again, I find an holly ſtandard, of near 'one hundred years old, drooping, and of doubtful 'aſpect; and a very beautiful hedge, though, indeed, 'much younger, being clipped about Michaelmas, is 'mortified near a foot beneath the top, and in ſome 'places to the very ground; ſo as there is nothing 'ſeems proof againſt ſuch a winter, which is late cut 'and expoſed. This hedge doth alſo grow againſt the 'ſouth, and is very ruſſet, whilſt the contrary ſide 'is as freſh and as green as ever; and, in all other 'places of my plantations that are ſhaded, the un-'ſhorn hollies maintain their verdure, and are, I 'judge, impregnable againſt all aſſaults of weather. 'Among the fruit-trees and murals, none ſeem to have 'ſuffered, ſave figs; but they being cut down will 'ſpring again at the root.

'The vines have eſcaped; and, of the eſculent plants 'and ſallads, moſt, except artichokes, which are uni-'verſally loſt; and, what I prefer before any ſallad 'whatever, eaten raw when young, my ſampier is all 'rotted to the very root. How to repair my loſs I 'know not, for I could never make any of the ſeed 'which came from the rock ſampier (though mine 'were of the very kind) to grow. The arboreſcent 'and other ſedums, aloes, &c. though houſed, 'periſhed with me; but the yucca and opuntia eſcaped. 'Tulips, many are loſt, and ſo the Conſtantinople 'narciſſus, and ſuch tuberoſæ as were not kept in the 'chimney-corner, where was continual fire. Some 'anemonies appear, but I believe many are rotted; but 'I have made no great ſearch in the flowery parterre; 'only I find that moſt capillaries ſpring, and other 'humble and repent plants, notwithſtanding all this 'rigorous ſeaſon. My tortoiſe, which, by his con-'ſtant burying himſelf in the earth at approach of 'winter, I looked upon as a kind of plant-animal, 'happening to be obſtructed by a vine-root from mi-'ning to the depth he was uſual wont to inter, is found 'ſtark-dead, after having many years eſcaped the 'ſevereſt winter. Of fiſh I have loſt very few; and 'the nightingales, which for being a ſhort-winged 'bird, and ſo exceedingly fat at the time of the year, 'we commonly ſuppoſe them to change the climate, 'whereas, indeed, they are then hardly able to flee an 'hundred yards, are as briſk and frolic as ever; nor 'do I think they alter their ſummer ſtations, whatever 'become of them all winter. I know not yet of any 'body who has given tolerable ſatisfaction in this par-'ticular, amongſt our Ornithologiſts.'

[S] Which will do laſting honour to his country.] The following treatiſes were publiſhed within the period aſſigned in the text. We know nothing of the firſt, except that it has had a place in the catalogue of our author's Works, from which therefore we have no right to remove it; the ſecond is a tranſlation, and annexed to another and larger work of the ſame author's; the third is that work which we have ſo much commended, and to which this note principally refers.

XXIV. "Mundus Muliebris: or, the Ladies "Dreſſing-Room unlocked, and her Toilette ſpread. "In Burleſque. Together with the Fop-Dictionary, "compiled for the Uſe of the Fair-Sex." London, 1690, 4to.

XXV. "Monſieur de la Quintinye's Treatiſe of "Orange-Trees, with the raiſing of Melons, omitted "in the French Editions; made Engliſh by John "Evelyn, Eſq." Lond. 1693.

This is added to the "Complete Gardener," written by the ſame author; tranſlated and publiſhed, in folio, with theſe pieces, by Mr. Evelyn. We are told at the beginning, that, about twenty years before, Monſ. de la Quintinye being in England, and making our author a viſit at his houſe, he requeſted of him ſome directions in relation to melons, for the cultivation of which that French gentleman was remarkably famous, who ſent them over accordingly to our author from Paris; and he aſſures us, that his great motive in publiſhing them was to put into the hands of the world in general, and of the lovers of the art of gardening in particular, the very beſt directions, that, in reference to this curious ſubject, had ever been given. Theſe inſtructions make in the whole but one half ſheet. "The Treatiſe of "Oranges" is larger, and is contained in thirteen chapters, excluſively of the preface; yet the chapters are of no great length, making in all not more than nine ſheets. The method is very natural and exact, the treatiſe full of curious obſervations; and therefore it was a great ſervice, rendered to the publick by Mr. Evelyn, to annex it to the tranſlation of the reſt of this great man's works, by which they are made complete.

XXVI. "Numiſmata: A Diſcourſe of Medals, An-"tient and Modern; together with ſome Account of "Heads and Effigies of illuſtrious and famous Per-"ſons, in Sculps and Taille Douce, of whom we "have no Medals extant, and of the Uſes to be "derived from them. To which is added, a Digreſſion "concerning Phyſiognomy. By J. Evelyn, S. R. S." Lond. 1697, folio.

There is, prefixed to this book, a ſhort but very affectionate dedication, in Latin, to the only ſon and heir of Sidney Lord Godolphin, then Francis Godolphin, Eſq. ſince the Right Honourable Francis Earl of Godolphin, of whoſe father, Mr. Evelyn (as indeed what good man does not?) makes moſt honourable mention, as of his moſt intimate and moſt faithful friend, recommending to his young patron the cultivation of thoſe ſhining virtues, and great abilities, which were inherent to his family; and remarking to him, his peculiar happineſs in deſcending from a line equally diſtinguiſhed for parts and probity. The ingenious author has entered on his noble and extenſive deſign by informing the reader in his epiſtle, that having begun this work about five years before, he deſiſted from proſecuting it, imagined, that being now on the borders of fourſcore, and having been at leaſt half a century an author, he would have thought it no diſhonour to have ſued out his Writ of Eaſe, when, being full of years and glory, he might have laid down his pen with as general an approbation from the candid judges of that age, as their fathers had ſhewn to thoſe treatiſes which fell from it when he firſt took it up. But Mr. Evelyn was not of that ſort of men who are glad of a plauſible excuſe of retiring from labour, notwithſtanding nature furniſhes them with ſtrength to go through it. On the contrary, he conſidered his health and his abilities, and, above all, his improved ſtock of knowledge from experience, as talents intruſted with him, by Providence, for the benefit of mankind; and he ſcorned, in his old age, to perform leſs diligently his duty than, from a true principle of public ſpirit, he had done in his youth. It was to this excellent frame of mind, ſo much admired and ſo little imitated, that we owe his laſt treatiſe, at leaſt his laſt new treatiſe upon ſallets (i), in which it is hard to ſay which deſerves to be upon the publiſhing of Mr. Walker's treatiſe upon the ſame ſubject; but, finding ſome particularities that admitted of a farther improvement, he went on again with his own diſcourſe, and, after a ſhort introduction, bewailing the failure of marbles, ſtatues, trophies, &c. in perpetuating memorable actions:

He begins his firſt chapter with the uſe of medals, either made for money, or to preſerve the memory of worthy actions; obſerving their very early uſe in the world, and that the firſt Roman money was braſs, without any mark at all; then ſhews the original of ſtamping, which was for a teſtimonial of their being of ſuch a weight. The firſt ſilver ſtamped at Rome was a little before the firſt Punic war, and gold not till about ſixty-two years after, at which time the worth of gold to ſilver was as twelve and a half to one, though in the earlieſt times it bore but a decuple value among the Romans and Greeks. Next, coming to ſpeak more particularly of medals, he is of opinion, that they did not, when firſt made, paſs for money, but were ſtampt in memory of particular famous actions or perſons. But, upon the inundation of the Goths, the luſtre of medals ended, with all the more polite arts. He then treats of the materials uſed for money, whether leather, paper, earth, porcelain, coral, ſhells, linen, or the like. He in the next place ſpeaks of the time when the ſeveral metals came firſt in uſe, and is inclined to think iron and copper were the firſt, of which he gives ſeveral inſtances. Then he proceeds to conſider the impreſſions and ſizes, of which latter there were three.

The ſecond chapter treats of the medals of ſeveral nations, as Hebraic, Punic, Barbarous, thoſe of the Goths, Huns, Lombards, &c. with the Britiſh coins; where he ſays, he has ſeen a ſeries of all our coins, from Edward the Confeſſor to his own times, except Richard the third. Then returning to ſpeak of medals, he mentions the Saturnalian, made in buffoonry, and touches upon ſome of the cuſtoms uſed at that feaſt; and obſerves, that, except thoſe, no medals were made but upon grave and ſerious occaſions. Speaking of the heads and reverſes, he ſays, medals without any reverſe are never antique, but may without head be good. Our author next makes ſeveral remarks touching the heads, as whether naked or crowned, bearded or ſhaven, &c. as likewiſe of the figures expreſſed at length on the reverſes. He proceeds to the Greek medals, with their ſeveral ornaments and reverſes; thence to the Barbarous, Parthian, Armenian, &c. and ſo to our Saxon, of all which he deſcribes the particular ornaments on their heads, &c. then he comes to medals made of remarkable perſons; touches upon Papal and French medals; after which he mentions the curious collection of Pyrrhus Ligorius, being twenty-ſix volumes of draughts of medals, inſcriptions, relievos, &c. Greek and Roman; of the Duke of Savoy's, Duke Albert's of Bavaria, now in the cuſtody of the Royal Society, containing the images of Roman Kings, Conſuls, Dictators, Knights, Tribunes, &c. from the foundation of Rome to Julius Cæſar; after which, he remarks the niceneſs of the Antients, in having their reſemblances taken by none but exquiſite maſters; whence we may well believe their medals to be very like them: he concludes this chapter with a propoſal of deſigning, in dead-life, by a very good hand, what medals of undoubted truth can be procured, and theſe to be as well and exactly engraven on copper-plates.

The third chapter treats of antient and modern reverſes, as they relate to hiſtory, chronology, and other parts of learning, the uſe and benefit whereof he ſhews in ſeveral particulars; informing us not only in Hiſtory and Chronology, but alſo giving the true form of ſeveral habits, inſtruments, engines, machines, inventions, atchievements, cuſtoms, &c. of the Antients, but imperfectly otherwiſe deſcribed; together with the figure under which they repreſented their gods and genii, particular countries, &c. with the ſeveral rewards, as crowns, &c. for virtuous and noble actions: then, deploring the want of medals to illuſtrate our own hiſtory, he gives an account of all, or the moſt, that have been ſtamped here, from Edward the Third through the ſeveral reigns to the late Revolution, referring the reader, for thoſe made ſince that time, to the late publiſhed "Hiſtoire Métallique de Guillaume III. by N. Che-"valier, Amſterdam, 1692;" folio.

The fourth chapter treats of perſons and things deſerving the honour of medals, though moſt of them never obtained it; and in this he finds our nation too deficient, and names ſeveral ingenious worthies then living.

The fifth chapter is of inſcriptions upon medals, and their ſeveral forms and differences, chiefly relating to Roman and Greek medals: here he gives us the notes and abbreviations of words to be met with in Roman medals.

In the ſixth chapter, he lays down inſtructions for the procuring antique and rare medals, with directions to diſtinguiſh the true from Counterfeits, preſenting a catalogue of ſome alphabetically; and in this place ſhews the ſeveral tricks uſed in making the cheats, and falſe ones, and ſets down ſome ways to take off medals, by a ſort of glue, and ſuch like curioſities.

In the ſeventh chapter, our author diſcourſes of mints, and the moſt ſkilful artiſts, with directions to collect and diſpoſe medals for the cabinet, and adds ſome reflections on the modern clipping and diminution of coin. Here he obſerves the great number of mints in the ſame kingdom formerly, and the excellency of the method now uſed in minting, far beyond the old way of hammering, and in this place gives his opinion and reaſons, againſt either debaſing the coin, or enhancing the value, and then enumerates the moſt eminent maſters in this art: amongſt them he mentions Trecia of Milan, who cut the King of Spain's arms on a table-diamond: next he gives a catalogue of authors treating of this ſubject, with ſome curious collectors of our own and other nations, and then concludes his chapter, with a catalogue of thoſe medals that ſucceed Jovianus, where Mr. Walker's catalogue ends.

The eighth chapter gives an account of heads and effigies in Taille-douce, with particular directions for ſuch a collection, preſenting us with a catalogue of perſons meriting a place therein, as well women as men.

The ninth chapter, which concludes the work, contains a digreſſion concerning phyſiognomy, where the Author, beginning with the head, goes through all the features of the face, and proportion of the body and limbs, giving his opinions and conjectures of the natural diſpoſitions, wit, and qualifications, to be gathered from the obſervation of each part and member particularly interſperſed with hiſtorical remarks.

commended moſt, the agreeable vivacity of his language, or the wonderful maturity of his judgment [T]. Happy old man! who, ſtill in full poſſeſſion of his parts, undertook and accompliſhed, ſome years after this, the reviewing of his "Sylva," in which laſt edition (k) he has interſperſed various circumſtances relative to his private life, as well as to his ſubject, and has alſo ſhewn that he had ſerious and affecting thoughts of his latter end, thought not put in mind of it by his infirmities, which are circumſtances, that, if farther explained, cannot be unacceptable to the inquiſitive reader [U]. XXVII. "Acetaria: A Diſcourſe of Sallets, by "J. E. S. R. S. Author of the Kalendarium." Lond. 1699. 8vo.

This, which was our Author's laſt work, was dedicated to the Lord Chancellor Somers, at that time Preſident of the Royal Society; and the view of this dedication was to procure a public eſtabliſhment for that ſociety, as will ſufficiently appear from the following paragraphs, which cannot ſeem tedious to the reader, ſince, excepting ſome of Mr. Dryden's, he will hardly find any dedication in our language, penned with equal elegance and ſpirit.

'My Lord,

'The idea and plan of the Royal Society having 'been firſt conceived and delineated by a great and 'learned Chancellor (31), which high office your 'Lordſhip deſervedly bears, not as an acquiſition of 'fortune, but your intellectual endowments, conſpi-'cuous (among other excellences) by the inclination 'your Lordſhip diſcovers to promote natural know-'ledge; as it juſtifies the diſcernment of that aſſembly 'to pitch upon your Lordſhip for their Preſident; ſo 'does it no leſs diſcover the candour, yea, I preſume 'to ſay, the ſublimity, of your mind, in ſo generouſly 'honouring them with your acceptance of the choice 'they have made.

'A Chancellor, and a very learned Lord, was the 'firſt who honoured the Chair; and a no leſs honour-'able and learned Chancellor reſigns it to your Lord-'ſhip (32).

'So, as after all the difficulties and hardſhips the 'ſociety has hitherto gone through, it has, through 'the favour and protection of its Preſidents, not only 'preſerved its reputation from the malevolence of 'enemies and detractors, but gone on culminating 'and now triumphantly in your Lordſhip: under 'whoſe propitious influence, I am perſuaded, it may 'promiſe itſelf that which indeed has hitherto been 'wanting to juſtify the glorious title it bears of a Royal 'Society, the emancipating it from ſome remaining 'and diſcouraging circumſtances which it as yet 'labours under, among which that of a precarious 'and unſteady abode is not the leaſt.

'This honour was reſerved for your Lordſhip, and 'an honour permit me to call it, not at all unworthy 'the owning of the greateſt perſon living, namely, 'the eſtabliſhing and promoting real knowledge, and 'next to what is divine, truly ſo called, as far at leaſt 'as human nature extends towards the knowledge of 'nature, by enlarging her Empire beyond the land 'of ſpectres, forms, intentional ſpecies, vacuum, occult 'qualities, and other inadequate notions, which by 'their obſtreperous and noiſy diſputes affrighting, and 'till of late deterring, men, from adventuring on far-'ther diſcoveries, confined them in a lazy acquieſ-'cence, and to be fed with fantaſms and fruitleſs ſpe-'culations, which ſignify nothing to the ſpecific na-'ture of things, ſolid and uſeful knowledge by the 'inveſtigation of cauſes, principles, energies, powers, 'and effects of bodies and things viſible, and to im-'prove them for the good and benefit of mankind.'

(31) Francis Lord Verulam, and Viſcount St. Albans.

(32) Lord Viſcount Brounker, Chancellor to Queen Katharine. Charles Mountague, Eſq. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

It is a great pity this propoſition of our Author's was not accepted, ſince undoubtedly a national eſtabliſhment under the direction of ſo wiſe and prudent a perſon, would have enabled the ſociety to have proſecuted their laudable and uſeful deſigns, in a manner worthy of themſelves and honourable to their country. It is not, however, impoſſible, that this propoſition might come to nothing by their Preſident's loſs of power, which fell out very ſoon after: but, however it happened, our Author's zeal and diligence in the application was truly laudable. He had the honour to be one of the firſt members, and he continued to be one of the moſt active for upwards of forty years. This laſt work is nothing inferior to any of the preceding: the ſame learning, the ſame perſpecuity, the ſame quickneſs and penetration, reign: through the whole, the reader meets not only with all that he can expect, but with much more, and ſuch a multitude of curious obſervations are interſperſed as render it as pleaſant and entertaining as it is uſeful. Yet, the Author ſuſpecting that ſome might poſſibly cenſure the great pains he had taken upon ſuch a ſubject, and thence infer, that he was led to treat ſuch matters, with ſo much ſkill and pains, from the refined luxury of his own palate, took care to guard againſt this in the following elegant apology, which he has inſerted in his dedication.

'The favour, I humbly beg, is your Lordſhip's par-'don for this preſumption. The ſubject is mean, and 'requires it, and my reputation in danger, ſhould 'your Lordſhip hence ſuſpect, that one could never 'write ſo much of dreſſing ſallets, who minded any 'thing ſerious beſides the gratifying a ſenſual appe-'tite with a voluptuary apician art. Truly, my Lord, 'I am ſo far from deſigning to promote thoſe ſupplici-'ciæ luxuriæ, as Seneca calls them, by what I have 'here written, that, were it in my power, I would 'recall the world, if not altogether to their priſtine 'diet, yet to a much more wholſome and temperate 'than is now in faſhion; and what if they find me 'like to ſome who are eager after hunting and other 'field-ſports, which are laborious exerciſes, and fiſh-'ing, which is indeed a lazy one, who, after all their 'pains and fatigue, never eat what they take and 'catch in either? For, ſome ſuch I have known: and 'though I cannot affirm ſo of myſelf, when a well-'dreſſed and excellent ſalad is before me, I am yet a 'very moderate eater of them. So, as to this book, 'luxury, I can affirm, and that truly, what the Poet 'ſays of himſelf, on a leſs innocent occaſion, Laſciva 'pagina, vita proba. God forbid, that, after all I 'have advanced in praiſe of ſalads, I ſhould be thought 'to plead for the vice I cenſure, and chuſe that of 'Epicurus for my Lemma: In hac arte conſenui: or 'to have ſpent my time in nothing elſe. The plan 'annexed to theſe papers, and the apparatus made to 'ſuperſtruct upon it, would acquit me of having bent 'all my contemplations on ſalads only. What I hum-'bly offer your Lordſhip is, as I ſaid, part of natural 'hiſtory, the product of horticulture, and the field 'dignified by the moſt illuſtrious, and ſometimes tilled 'Laureato vomere, which, as it concerns a part of Phi-'loſophy, I may without vanity be allowed to have 'taken ſome pains in cultivating, as an inferior mem-'ber of the Royal Society.' Such was the modeſty, ſuch the learning, and ſuch the politeneſs, of this great man!

[U] To the inquiſitive reader.] It is chiefly from the works of great men, that the curious and particular paſſages of their lives are to be collected. This indeed is a thing of great labour, but at the ſame time infinitely pleaſant to thoſe who delight in honouring the memory of ſuch benefactors to mankind. In this note, we intend a ſpecimen of this ſort from the moſt extenſive and moſt hiſtorical of our Author's performances. We thence learn, that the true ſignification of his Surname, Evelyn, written antiently Avelan fore hinted, that, as his collections were very great, ſo he was far from confining them entirely to his own uſe, but was ever ready to communicate them for the benefit of others; and that, conſidered in that light, he was a great benefactor to the public. An inſtance has been given in the notes to this purpoſe, in reſpect to the famous Mr. Boyle; and many inſtances more might be given, of which, not to treſpaſs on the reader's patience, we will mention but a few. He it was that furniſhed to the late reverend and learned Biſhop of London thoſe additional remarks on the county of Surrey (l), which are publiſhed in his Engliſh edition of the "Britannia." He contributed largely to Mr. Houghton's valuable work (m); and the ingenious John Aubrey, Eſq. has teſtified how often he was indebted to him for his friendly aſſiſtance in many of his undertakings (n). In reſpect to the Royal Society, he was equally aſſiduous in his attendance, and careful in his intelligence. Whatever fell within the compaſs of his own extenſive enquiries, he never failed to tranſmit them to that judicious body, nor was he leſs attentive to the procuring them proper correſpondents both at home and abroad, of which copious teſtimonies are to be met with in their Regiſters, and in their printed

Avelan or Evelin, was filberd, or rather hazel, which gives him occaſion to remark, that theſe trees are commonly produced where quarries of free-ſtone lie underneath, as at Hazelbury in Wiltſhire, Haſlingfield in Cambridgeſhire, and Haſlemere in Surrey (33). He more than once remarks, that his grandfather was a great planter and preſerver of timber, as it ſeems were the antient poſſeſſors of the place where he lived, whence it acquired its name of Wotton (i. e.) Woodtown, from the groves and plantations that were about it (34). He farther remarks, that there was an oak felled by his grandfather's order, out of which there was a table made, meaſured by himſelf more than once of five feet in breadth, nine and a half in length, and ſix inches thick, all entire and clear. It was ſet up in brick-work for a paſtry-board; and, to fit it for that uſe, it was ſhortened by a foot, being originally ten feet and a half, as appeared from an inſcription cut in one of its ſides, whence it appeared to have lain there above one hundred years, when our author wrote this deſcription (35). When his grandfather's woods were cut down, which conſiſted entirely of oak, they ſprang up again, not oaks but beeches; and, when theſe two in their turn felt the axe, there aroſe ſpontaneouſly a third plantation, not of oak or beech, but of birch, which he does not ſet down as a thing ſingular in itſelf, but becauſe it happened under his own eye (36). He is a declared enemy to iron works, on account of their deſtroying woods; yet he obſerves, from the prudential maxims prevailing in his own family, they had quite a contrary effect, as being one principal cauſe of their making ſuch large plantations, and taking ſo much pains about them (37). It was a relation of his, that ſold Richmond new Park to King Charles the Firſt, after planting many fine trees there (38). Our author carried this diſpoſition with him to Sayes-Court, where he muſt have ſhewn it very early, ſince he aſſures us, that the Marquis of Argyle preſented him with the cones of a peculiar kind of fir, which he takes to be the Spaniſh pinaſter, or wild pine, and gives a very particular account of the manner in which they grew in the Marquis's county in Scotland (39). He informs us, that it was the Lord Chancellor Bacon who introduced the true plane tree, which he planted originally about Verulam, whence he had his title (40). Mr. Evelyn takes to himſelf the honour of having propagated the alaternus from Cheſhire to Cumberland, which was before reputed an inhabitant only of the green-houſe, but is found very capable, not only of living without doors, but of ſtanding unhurt by the rigour of our ſevereſt winters (41). He mentions a moſt glorious and impenetrable holly-hedge, which he had at Sayes-Court four hundred feet in length, nine feet high, and five in diameter, which occaſions his dropping a hint, that the fine gardens he had raiſed there were wholly ruined by the Czar of Muſcovy, who it ſeems lived there for the ſake of being near the yard (42). He recommended Mr. Gibbons, the Carver, to King Charles the Second, by whom ſome exquiſite works were performed in St. Paul's Cathedral (43). He was likewiſe conſulted by the Bedford family, about preſerving their fine trees, ſo long as the gardens were kept up about Bedford-Houſe, which before the laſt edition of his book were demoliſhed, to make way for the new buildings about Bloomſbury (44). He takes notice of an admirable remedy for a Dyſentery, which had been otherwiſe, in all probability, buried in oblivion, and this is the fungus ſubſtance ſeparated from the lobes of Walnut Kernels, powdered and given in a glaſs of wine, which, he affirms, relieved the Engliſh ſoldiers in the famous Dundalk Campaign in Ireland, ſoon after the Revolution, when all other remedies failed (45). He was acquainted with the Conde Mellor, a Portugueſe Nobleman, who reſided ſome time at the Court of King Charles the Second, when an exile from his own, by whom he was informed, that his father, when Prime-Miniſter, as himſelf had likewiſe been, received in a caſe a collection of plants of China oranges of which only one eſcaped, and was with difficulty recovered; and yet from this plant came all the China oranges that ever were ſeen in Europe, which our author obſerves, is a moſt noble and wonderful inſtance of what induſtry may do from the ſlighteſt and leaſt promiſing beginnings (46). One inſtance of the vaſt advantages derived from woods I ſhall borrow, becauſe the facts are notorious and indiſputable (47). 'Upon the eſtate 'of George Pitt, Eſquire, of Strathfieldſea, in the 'County of Southampton, a ſurvey of timber being 'taken in the year 1659, it came to ten thouſand 'three hundred pounds, beſides near ten thouſand 'ſamplers not valued and growing up naturally. 'Since this there hath been made, by ſeveral ſales, 'five thouſand ſix hundred pounds, and there has been 'felled for repairs, building, and neceſſary uſes, to 'the value at the leaſt of twelve hundred pounds, ſo as 'the whole falls of timber amount to ſix thouſand 'eight hundred pounds. The timber upon the ſame 'ground being again ſurveyed, anno 1677, appears 'to be worth above twenty-one thouſand pounds, 'beſides eight or nine thouſand ſamplers, and 'young trees to be left ſtanding, and not reckoned 'in the ſurvey. But, what is yet to be obſerved, 'moſt of this timber abovementioned, being oak, 'grows in hedge-rows, and ſo as that the ſtanding of 'it does very little prejudice to the plough or paſture.' To conclude; this worthy perſon, who was born in a town famous for wood, who derived from his anceſtors an affection for plantations, who wrote the moſt correct treatiſe of foreſt-trees extant in our own, or, perhaps, in any language, and who was himſelf a moſt eminent planter, had a ſtrong deſire, after the example of Sir William Temple, who directed his heart to be depoſited in his garden, to have his corpſe alſo interred in the like manner (48); but very probably he was prevailed upon to alter his mind afterwards, notwithſtanding what he had expreſſed upon that ſubject (49) in his book; which ſhews how warm and laſting that paſſion for improvement was in his own breaſt, which, with ſo much learning, eloquence, and ſucceſs, he laboured to excite in the boſoms of his countrymen.

Tranſactions (o) [W]. He might, therefore, juſtly ſtyle himſelf, as he did, a Pioneer in their ſervice; which expreſſion was well choſen, ſince it marked at once how humble and how indefatigable he was, in whatever might contribute to the advancement of that noble deſign, which was the baſis of their inſtitution. He was a true lover of freedom of thought in all philoſophical enquiries, which as he practiſed upon all occaſions himſelf, ſo he very readily indulged it to others; and though nobody was freer from prejudices, or ſpoke more diſcreetly than he did, of books that it was impoſſible for him to commend, yet he never reſented any attack made upon his own, but bore the contradiction of his opinion with all imaginable temper, being perſuaded that truth and rea-

[W] In their printed Tranſactions.] It would take up too much time and room, to take notice of every thing that occurs, in this valuable collection, that might be alleged to this purpoſe; and, therefore, we ſhall content ourſelves with a few inſtances. Upon ſome diſcourſe, at the Royal Society, of the eruptions of Mount Veſuvius, he procured the following extract of a letter from Mr. Henry Robinſon, to whom it was written by Captain William Baddily, and at the ſame time produced ſome of the aſhes which are mentioned therein; which letter, and which aſhes, had been preſerved for upwards of thirty years (50).

(50) Philoſoph. Tranſactions, No. 21.

'The ſixth of December, 1631, being in the Gulph 'of Volo riding at anchor about ten of the clock that 'night, it began to rain ſand or aſhes, and continued 'till two of the clock the next morning. It was about 'two inches thick on the deck, ſo that we caſt it over-'board with ſhovels, as we did ſnow the day before: 'the quantity of a buſhel we brought home, and pre-'ſented to ſeveral friends, eſpecially to the Maſters of 'Trinity-Houſe. There was in our company Capt. 'John Wilds, commander of the Dragon, and Capt. 'Anthony Watts, commander of the Elizabeth and 'Dorcas. There was no wind ſtirring when theſe 'aſhes fell: it did not fall only in the places where we 'were, but likewiſe in other parts, as ſhips were co-'ming from St. John d'Acre to our port, they being at 'that time an hundred leagues from us. We compared 'the aſhes together, and found them both one. If you 'deſire to ſee the aſhes, let me know."——Thus, in the ſpring of the year 1670, our author communicated, in the following letter to the Lord Viſcount Brouncker, a large and circumſtantial account of a very ſingular and extraordinary invention, by a perſon of rank, called the Spaniſh Sembrador, or new engine for ploughing and equal ſowing all ſorts of grain and harrowing at once; by which a great quantity of ſeed-corn is ſaved, and a rich increaſe yearly gained; together with a deſcription of the contrivance and uſes of this engine, which epiſtle ran thus (51).

(51) Ibid. No. 60.

'I cannot deviſe better how to expreſs my great re-'ſpects to your Lordſhip than by my utmoſt endea-'vours to promote the intereſt of that Society, over 'which you have ſo long, with ſo much ability and af-'fection, ſo faithfully preſided. This, therefore, will 'plead my excuſe with your Lordſhip, if, in ſome con-'fidence of gratifying the generous deſigns of that 'noble aſſembly, I communicate to them, through 'your hands, not only the inſtrument which I herewith 'preſent them, but the deſcription of the uſe and be-'nefit of it, from ſuch a deſerent, as I am ſure they will 'very highly value.

'My Lord, it is now almoſt two years ſince, that, 'by ſomewhat an odd accident, lighting upon a paper 'lately printed in Spaniſh, I found a ſhort paſſage in 'it, giving notice of a certain plough newly brought 'out of Germany into Spain; in both which places 'it had, upon trial, ſo generally obtained, as, beſides 'the royal privilege which was granted to the in-'ventor, to procure the univerſal approbation. Upon 'this hint I took the boldneſs to write to my Lord 'Ambaſſador, intreating his Excellency, that, as his 'more weighty affairs would give him leave, he would 'not diſdain to inform himſelf more particularly con-'cerning it. This his Lordſhip was not only pleaſed to 'do, but ſo highly obliging as to tranſmit to me the 'engine itſelf, together with a full deſcription of it and 'its uſe: all of it written with his own noble hand, 'which I do here conſecrate to the Royal Society, to 'be inſerted among their precious cimelia.

'My Lord, being not ſo happy as to wait on you 'myſelf with it, at your public aſſembly this day, I 'deſire your Lordſhip will cauſe theſe papers to be 'read there, and expoſe the inſtrument to their ex-'amination and trial. There are many gentlemen who 'will not be offended with theſe ruſticities, and who 'know how highly ſuch inventions, and even attempts, 'have been valued by the greateſt and the beſt of men. 'Something ('tis poſſible) may happen to be out of or-'der, by reaſon of the long journey it hath paſſed: 'but their ingenious Curator will ſoon be able to re-'form, and, if need be, improve, it. My Lord, of 'Sandwich is that illuſtrious perſon to whom the So-'ciety is obliged for this, and many other favours and 'productions of his own more conſummate genius, 'which enrich their regiſters. But, let me tell them, 'his Lordſhip hath made, and brought home with 'him, ſuch other polite notices and particulars, of 'Spain and other foreign parts, as I know no perſon, 'of the moſt refined and public ſpirit, who hath ap-'proached him beſides your Lordſhip: an emulous 'and worthy example, certainly to the reſt of our 'noblemen and miniſters of ſtate abroad, who may 'travel with ſo many advantages to inform themſelves 'above others: and it is to me a ſhining inſtance of 'both your Lordſhip's happy talents and great com-'prehenſion, that, in the throng of ſo many and ſo 'weighty employments, you can think of cultivating 'the arts, and of doubly obliging your country.'

The deſcription of this machine, tranſlated from the Spaniſh into Engliſh, is of a conſiderable length, and therefore we refer the reader to it in the Tranſactions. The chief reaſon for mentioning it here was, to ſhew how vigilant our author was in his enquiries, and how diligent in the proſecution of them; and yet not with any view of concealing the diſcoveries he made, but quite the contrary, that the Royal Society might have the honour, and the Britiſh nation the benefit, of them. In this reſpect, no doubt, he reaped abundant ſatisfaction, ſince it was declared, over and over again in the Tranſactions, that his Sylva had raiſed whole foreſts, and his Pomona produced numberleſs orchards: yet, that he affected not praiſe out of any degree of vanity, but was really pleaſed with being the inſtrument of good to others, appears very plainly from that warmth, as well as readineſs, with which he recommended other men's works to the favour of the publick, even upon ſubjects on which he had employed his own pen, particularly in the caſe of Mr. Smith, which is printed in the Tranſactions (52).

(52) Ib. No. 103.

He was alſo very aſſiduous in procuring, as early as poſſible from abroad, all new books upon curious and uſeful ſubjects; as alſo ſuch as, from their univerſal high character, were become ſcarce and dear; ſome of which he communicated to the Secretary of the Society, and of others he made large and curious extracts himſelf; and, as is very juſtly obſerved, his tranſlations were doubly valuable, on account of that clearneſs and fidelity with which he expreſſed the author's ſenſe, and the improvements that he added from his own obſervations, as he rendered no treatiſes into Engliſh, without being perfectly verſed in the ſubject upon which, as well as the language in which, they were written. He likewiſe, in teſtimony of his reſpect and duty to the Society, beſtowed upon them thoſe curious tables of veins and arteries, which he brought with him from Padua, and conſequently deſerved to be honourably mentioned in their regiſters, and to have his picture, as it is, hung up in their apartments (35).

[X] Though in defence of ſentiments ever ſo well founded] Amongſt other advantages that attended the inſtitution of the Royal Society, one was its giving birth to, and the higheſt encouragement for, free and open enquiries; nor was it any wonder, that, amongſt theſe, ſome turned upon thoſe learned perſons who firſt exerted themſelves in favour of this method of improving knowledge. Amongſt theſe, Mr. John Houghton, though with great decency and good manners, cenſured our author's great performance, on account of its croſſing a notion he had advanced, 'that it would 'be highly advantageous for the nation, if all the 'timber within twelve miles of a navigable river were 'deſtroyed.' It is but fair that he ſhould ſpeak for himſelf: his words then are theſe (54):

(54) Collections on Huſbandry and Trade, Vol. IV. p. 273.

'I queſtion not but you eagerly expect to hear 'what may be ſaid, in anſwer to Mr. Evelyn's Sylva. 'There he ſeems to be quite of another opinion, and 'to give many inſtances of profits from woods, ſo great 'that few other parts of huſbandry can equal them. 'I muſt confeſs Mr. Evelyn is a great man, one that I 'have the honour to be acquainted with, and happy 'is he that is ſo: he is a gentleman of great piety, 'modeſty, and complacency; and alſo endowed with 'with ſuch an univerſality of uſeful learning, that he 'may very well be eſteemed a darling of mankind. 'But he is particularly well verſed in the affairs of the 'woodman; and his Sylva is ſo good a book, that 'I have not heard of any thing written on the ſubject 'like it. To anſwer it, I will not pretend; to gain-'ſay what he affirms I can't, for I believe he loves 'veracity more than life. I will only make ſome ob-'ſervations, and, if my ſentiments differ from his, I 'know he will pardon me, he being well inclined to 'allow freedom of thought, and alſo well verſed in a 'motto, (*) Nullius in Verba.

(*) That of the Royal Society.

'Now, I firſt obſerve the reaſon why this Sylva, or 'diſcourſe of foreſt-trees, was delivered to the Royal 'Society. It was, as I am told, in the title-page, 'upon occaſion of certain queries propounded to that 'illuſtrious aſſembly, by the honourable the principal 'Officers and Commiſſioners of the Navy. What theſe 'queries were, do not altogether appear; but, by the 'diſcourſe, one of them ſeems to be how timber might 'be propagated in his Majeſty's dominions. An an-'ſwer to this, our ingenious author hath bravely given. 'But my conſiderations are not how, or how not, to 'propagate timber; but a query, "Whether it is beſt, 'within certain limits, to propagate it or no?" a thing 'quite beſide his deſign.

'Indeed, in his introduction, he, like a very good 'Engliſhman, laments the notorious decay of our 'wooden walls, which he thought likely to follow, 'when our then preſent navy ſhould be worn out or 'impaired; and, I muſt confeſs, when he conſidered 'the great deſtruction of our wood that had been 'made in the foregoing twenty years, by ſome through 'neceſſity, and others through ill ends and purpoſes; 'together with our not being uſed to fetch much tim-'ber from abroad, and a general cry that none could 'furniſh us with any for ſhipping, eſpecially ſo good 'as our own; with the addition of what amounted to 'a complaint from the honourable Commiſſioners of 'his Majeſty's navy: when he conſidered all this, I 'ſay, every good man will rather commend than 'blame his zeal.

'But now ſince that deſtruction of our timber hath 'forced us to look out for a more convenient ſupply to 'London, and ſome other places, and our having 'greater experiences of ſea-fights than ever we had 'before, other things are known; and, it is believed, 'to my certain knowledge, by ſome of the Commiſ-'ſioners of the navy, and others, that have been 'greatly concerned in building of ſhips, that there is 'ſome other timber in the world that will build ſhips 'as well as ours: for inſtance, the French Ruby that 'we took from France, when he joined with Den-'mark and Holland againſt us, had ſuch good timber 'in it, that, as I have been told, England never had 'better. The bullets that entered this French ſhip 'made only round holes without ſplinters, the thing 'our timber is valued for; and it was ſo hard, that the 'carpenters, with their tools, could hardly cut it, it 'was like a piece of iron.

'I fancy it ſome of that oak Mr. Evelyn ſpeaks of 'in his forecited "Sylva," chap. III. p. 25. "There "is, ſaith he, a kind of it ſo tough, and ſo extremely "compact, that our ſharpeſt tools will hardly enter it; "and ſcarely the very fire itſelf, in which it conſumes "but ſlowly, as ſeeming to partake of a ferrugineous "and metalline ſhining nature, proper for ſundry ro-"buſt uſes." Theſe laſt thirty ſhips that were built 'have a great deal of foreign timber in them; and, 'although there is ſome decay in them already, yet I 'am told that the fault is not attributed to the foreign 'timber, but rather to the haſty building; the King 'having not a ſtock before-hand, the timber had not 'time enough for a ſeaſoning. For theſe reaſons, and 'what I ſaid before about the increaſe of ſeamen, per-'ſuades me to believe, that ſuch means will never 'leſſen our ſtrength; and I queſtion not, but that, for 'our money, we may be furniſhed ſufficiently from 'abroad.'

This paper was publiſhed November the ſixth, 1683, and October the thirty-firſt, 1701. The ſame gentleman publiſhed another paper, in which he maintained his former opinion (55), and undertakes to refute Mr. Evelyn's obſervations, as to the profit made by planting, complaining that what he had before written was never anſwered: intimating, at the ſame time, that the reaſon was, becauſe it was unanſwerable: his words are theſe: 'Mr. Evelyn tells us of 'one Mr. Edward Salter, who planted an aſh, and 'before his death ſold it for forty ſhillings. I will 'not reckon the ground this aſh grew on to be worth 'any thing; but ſuppoſe the aſh when planted was 'worth but one ſhilling, and had the man lived but 'eighty-four years after, the ſhilling would have 'amounted to ſix pounds eight ſhillings, which is far 'better than forty ſhillings.

(55) Ib. Vol. III. p. 179.

'Again: three acres of barren land ſown with acorns 'in ſixty years became a very thriving wood, and was 'worth three hundred pounds. Being 'twas barren 'land, I'll ſuppoſe it worth but three ſhillings the 'acre, nine ſhillings the three acres; which for ſixty 'years was worth, in preſent money, fifteen pounds, 'nine ſhillings, and ſeven-pence; which, doubled 'every twelve years, makes four hundred ninety-five 'pounds, ſix ſhillings, and eight-pence. Suppoſe 'that the tillage, acorns, and ſetting, came but to 'the third part of fifteen pounds; which together 'makes above ſix hundred pounds, for the three 'hundred pounds.'

This warm cenſure might be ſafely truſted by our author, without any anſwer, in thoſe days, when none pretended to decide without hearing both parties with attention. It is, however, but doing common juſtice to his memory, to ſet theſe points in a clear light, more eſpecially as it may be done in a very narrow compaſs. In the firſt place, Mr. Evelyn lays down facts that are indiſputable, for he mentions no improvement in his book without clear authority. On the contrary, Mr. Houghton's is a ſuppoſition, and, which is worſe, a ſuppoſition that is entirely groundleſs. He values the young aſh-plant at a ſhilling; he might have read in Mr. Evelyn, that an hundred ſaplings, of three years growth, are worth but eighteen-pence. Inſtead of fourſcore and four years, he ought to have ſet down a third, or at moſt half, that time; and then, at his own rate of compound intereſt, the value of the plant would not have exceeded a ſingle penny. His objections to the ſecond inſtance, are not leſs frivolous. Barren ground, in the common acceptation of the word, is ground worth nothing, and for that reaſon unlet and unemployed: our critic will have it worth three ſhillings an acre, and, having thus created a rent of nine ſhillings a year, he converts it next into a rent-charge, and ſuppoſes a ſixty years leaſe of this barren land to he publiſhed, and the variety of the ſubjects upon which he employed his time, it is impoſſible to forbear wondering at his induſtry and application, which muſt be greatly heightened when we reflect how careful he was in reviewing, correcting, and augmenting, all his original works; whence it is evident, that whatever ſubject appeared weighty enough to attract his attention, it never loſt its place in his thoughts, but, on the contrary, was often reviewed, and reaped the continual benefit of the new lights he received, as well as of his future meditations, which is the true reaſon that his treatiſes are ſo perfect in their kind, and continue as much eſteemed by poſterity as they were by the inquiſitive and judicious part of the world at the time they came firſt from the preſs. But this is not all; and our aſtoniſhment cannot but attend the information of his leaving behind him unfiniſhed, or at leaſt unpubliſhed, works of a more extenſive nature than thoſe that are printed, which had coſt him incredible pains, and for the compoſing of which he had made prodigious collections (q) [Y]. The hiſtory of this learned be worth two and thirty years purchaſe; and this money, put out at compound intereſt, is run up to twice as much as the wood is worth. We will not puſh things to extremity, but ſuppoſe, with him, the land worth nine ſhillings a year, and to be ſold for twenty years purchaſe, which would produce nine pounds. That nine pounds placed out at compound intereſt, at the rate of ſix per cent. would amount, in ſixty years, to two hundred eighty-eight pounds; ſo that there is twelve pounds, and all the intermediate profits by lopping, to pay for the original plantation and cultivation of the trees. Upon the whole it is manifeſt, even from this author's manner of arguing, that planting wood is not only more honeſt and virtuous, but at the ſame time a ſafer and ſpeedier way of raiſing a great fortune than the moſt exorbitant uſury.

[Y] He had made prodigious collections.] We may, from the large works which Mr. Evelyn has publiſhed, from the complete plan which he has given us of a large work he intended to publiſh, and from various circumſtances that occur in his letters, form a pretty ſure judgment of the method purſued by him, in compoſing the many and valuable treatiſes that fell from his pen. His way was, when he had made choice of a ſubject, to reſolve it into its proper parts, and to entitle theſe according to the bulk of the volume, he propoſed, either books or chapters, that he might digeſt his materials under their proper titles. He then ſet down his own thoughts in a free ſuccinct manner under every head, to which he added what occurred to him, uſeful or memorable in his reading; and, when he had finiſhed this, he digeſted his own thoughts regularly, ſupporting them by proper teſtimonies, from antient and modern authors, or, if that were the caſe, ſhewing the reaſons for which he diſſented from them. This made his collections very large, in compariſon of the books he publiſhed, into which there entered nothing but the quinteſſence of the authors he had peruſed. The firſt great work which occupied his thoughts was one of which he formed the plan in his travels, and of which neither Mr. Wood, Mr. Aubrey, nor any other writer that I have met with, takes the leaſt notice, though it was certainly a very great and important deſign, every way worthy of his learning, penetration, and vaſt abilities. He intended to have called it

"A General Hiſtory of all Trades."

We have an account of this in one of his own letters to Mr. Boyle, in which he aſſigns the reaſons for his laying it aſide, after it had coſt him incredible pains and application. The reader will, without doubt, be pleaſed to ſee what he has ſaid upon this ſubject, his letter is dated from Sayes-Court, Auguſt the ninth, 1659, and begins thus (56).

(56) Boyle's Works, Vol. V. P. 397.

'I am perfectly aſhamed at the remiſſneſs of this 'recognition for your late favours from Oxon, 'where, though had you reſided, it ſhould have in-'terrupted you before this time. It was by our com-'mon and good friend Mr. Hartlib, that I came now 'to know you are retired from thence, but not from 'the Muſes, and the purſuit of your worthy deſigns, 'the reſult whereof we thirſt after with all impatience, 'and how fortunate ſhould I eſteem myſelf, if it were 'in my power to contribute in the leaſt to that which 'I augure of ſo great and univerſal a benefit! But ſo 'it is, that my late inactivity has made ſo ſmall a 'progreſs, that, in the "Hiſtory of Trades," I am 'not advanced a ſtep, finding to my infinite grief, my 'great imperfections for the attempt, and the many 'ſubjections which I cannot ſupport, of converſing 'with mechanical capricious perſons, and ſeveral 'other diſcouragements; ſo that, giving over a deſign 'of that magnitude, I am ready to acknowledge my 'fault, if, from any expreſſion of mine, there was 'any room to hope for ſuch a production farther than 'by a ſhort collection of ſome heads and materials, 'and a continual propenſity of endeavouring, in ſome 'particular, to encourage ſo noble a work as far as 'I am able; a ſpecimen whereof I have tranſmitted 'to Mr. Hartlib, concerning the ornaments of gar-'dens, which I have requeſted him to communicate 'to you, as one from whom I hope to receive my 'beſt and moſt conſiderable furniture, which favour I 'do again and again humbly ſupplicate, and eſpecially 'touching the firſt chapter of the third book, the 'eleventh and twelfth of the firſt, and indeed on every 'particular of the whole.' Whoever would be better acquainted with the whole extent of our author's project, may conſult his extract of the life of Signor Giacomo Favi, who had the like, and intended to have travelled over the whole world, in order to collect proper materials; in which deſign having made ſome progreſs, he died of a fever at Paris. Of this gentleman, Mr. Evelyn ſpeaks in raptures, from the ſimilitude between their tempers; but, it ſeems, he had not altogether the patience of that Italian virtuoſo, who could accommodate himſelf to the humours of the loweſt of the people as well as make himſelf acceptable even to the greateſt monarchs of Europe (57). But, though our author deſiſted from the original plan, yet it was not till he had finiſhed ſeveral parts of it, particularly his Chalcography, which Mr. Boyle prevailed upon him to publiſh, and the following pieces which he never publiſhed.

(57) See the Life of this eminent perſon, who was a native of Bologna in Italy, prefixed to Mr. Evelyn's Chalcography.

"Five Treatiſes, containing a full View of the ſe-"veral Arts of Painting in Oil, Painting in Miniature, "anealing in Glaſs, enamelling, and making Marble-'Paper."

We may form a judgment from the piece he publiſhed, of the great loſs the world had from his not altering his reſolution, with reſpect to theſe, which no doubt were as thoroughly finiſhed and as perfect in their kind as that. We may collect, from the letter before mentioned, that a ſyſtem of gardening made a part of his great deſign, which, however, there are ſome grounds to believe, he detached thence, and conſidered as a whole or diſtinct ſyſtem of itſelf, to the completing of which he applied himſelf with great ſpirit and labour, and intended to have given it the following title, under which he ſhewed part of his collection to his friends.

"Elyſium Britannicum."

We cannot poſitively affirm, but there are very probable grounds to believe, that this was the very ſame work, of which he has given a plan before his "Ace-"taria," about which he intimates, in his Preface to that treatiſe, he had ſpent upwards of forty years, and his collections for which had in that time filled ſeveral thouſand pages. The title of this vaſt work, as it is there expreſſed, is this:

learned perſon's life and labours terminates together; for, in a ſhort time after he had fitted the fourth edition of his "Sylva" for the preſs, he departed this life in the eighty-ſixth year of his age, Feb. 27, 1705-6 (r), and was interred at Wotton, in a tomb of about three feet high of free-ſtone, ſhaped like a coffin, with an inſcription upon a white marble ſtone with which it is covered (s), expreſſing, according to his own intention (t), "That living in an age of extraordinary events and revolutions, he "had learned from thence this truth, which he deſired might be thus communicated to "poſterity, That all is vanity which is not honeſt, and that there is no ſolid wiſdom "but in real piety." As to that more laſting monument, which the pens of the moſt learned and ingenious men have conſecrated to his memory, in the characters which they have afforded us of him and his writings, the reader will find ſome notice taken at the bottom of the page [Z]. "The Plan of a Royal Garden. Deſcribing and "ſhewing the Amplitude of that Part of Georgicks "which belongs to Horticulture."

He propoſed to divide this into three books, the firſt of which was to conſiſt of ſix chapters, wherein he meant to diſcourſe of the principles of things, the four reputed elements, the celeſtial influences, the ſeaſons, the natural ſoil of a garden, and all the artificial improvements that could be made therein. The ſecond book was to contain twenty-four chapters, and of theſe it is ſufficient to ſay, that the twentieth chapter ſeems to have been executed in his diſcourſe of ſallads, and that the laſt chapter of this book, was no other than his Gardener's Kalendar. The third book was to be divided into twelve chapters, and to comprehend all the acceſſaries, ſo as to leave nothing which had ſo much as any relation to this favourite ſubject unexhauſted. The cauſe of his leaving this work alſo unfiniſhed, he very freely and plainly tells us, was his perceiving, that it exceeded his whole power of execution, that is, to come up to the ſcheme formed in his own mind, notwithſtanding his glorious ſpirit, his eaſy fortune, and indefatigable diligence. This we may very eaſily credit, when we conſider that his treatiſe of ſallads could not be above a fortieth, perhaps, not above a fiftieth, part of his intended performance.

To theſe his unpubliſhed works, we muſt add another, mentioned only by Mr. Wood, who gives us nothing concerning it but the following title.

Our Author had likewiſe etched, when he came to Paris, 1649 (59), five ſeveral proſpects of places, which he had drawn on the ſpot, between Rome and Naples, to which he prefixed alſo a frontiſpiece, intitled, "Locorum aliquot inſignium & celeberrimorum "inter Romam & Neapolin, jacentium ὑποδειξις & "Exemplaria; Domino Domino, Thomæ Henſhaw, "Anglo, omnium eximiarum & preclariſſimarum "artium cultori ac propugnatori maximo & συνοπψαμενῳ "αὐτῷ, non propter operis pretium ſed ut ſingulare "amoris ſui teſtimonium exhibeat prima has ἀδοκιμασίας "aqua ſorti excuſas & inſculptas Jo. [Z] Taken at the bottom of the page.] It is a natural and very juſt method of concluding articles like this with characters of the author by eminent perſons; for, it is firſt paying a due reſpect to their memories; next, it affords the reader ſatisfaction, who is deſirous of learning on what authorities ſuch high characters are built; and, laſtly, it juſtifies the praiſes beſtowed, and the pains taken, in the compiling ſuch articles, more eſpecially when they are carried to an extraordinary length. But it is requiſite, that even this neceſſary attention ſhould be kept within juſt bounds; and therefore having already cited Mr. Boyle, and the Royal Society, in praiſe of Mr. Evelyn, we ſhall now confine ourſelves only to a few, and thoſe too the moſt eminent, of the learned writers, who have celebrated this great man, and endeavoured to do juſtice to his labours. We will begin with Abraham Cowley, Eſq. who, in his Eſſay, intituled, "The Garden," having declared that a rural retreat, and a life of privacy and ſtudy, was the utmoſt extent of his wiſh, and had been ſo for many years, proceeds thus (60): 'Several accidents 'of my ill fortune have diſappointed me hitherto, and 'do ſtill, of that felicity; for, though I have made the 'firſt and hardeſt ſtep to it, by abandoning all am'bitions and hopes of this world, and by retiring from 'the noiſe of all buſineſs, and almoſt all company; 'yet, I ſtick ſtill in the inn of a hired houſe and 'garden, among weeds and rubbiſh, and without 'that pleaſanteſt work of human induſtry, the im'provement of ſomething which we call not very pro'perly, but yet we call our own. I am gone out 'from Sodom, but I am not yet arrived at my little 'Zoar. O let me eſcape thither (is it not a little one?) 'and my ſoul ſhall live. I do not look back yet, but 'I have been forced to ſtop, and make too many 'halts. You may wonder, Sir, for, this ſeems a 'little too extravagant and pindarical for proſe, what 'I mean by all this preface: it is to let you know, that, 'though I have miſſed, like a chymiſt, my great 'end, yet I account my affections and endeavours 'well rewarded by ſomething that I have met with 'by the bye; which is, that they have procured me 'ſome part in your kindneſs and eſteem, and thereby 'the honour of having my name ſo advantageouſly 'recommended to poſterity by the epiſtle you are 'pleaſed to prefix to the moſt uſeful book that has 'been written in that kind, and which is to laſt as 'long as months and years. Among many other arts 'and excellences which you enjoy, I am glad to find 'this favourite of mine the moſt predominant, that 'you chuſe this for your wife, though you have hun'dreds of other arts for your concubines, though you 'know them, and beget ſons upon them all, to which 'you are rich enough to allow great legacies; yet, 'the iſſue of this ſeems to be deſigned by you to the 'main of the eſtate; you have taken moſt pleaſure in 'it, and beſtowed moſt charges upon its education: 'and I doubt not to ſee that book, which you pleaſed 'to promiſe to the world, and of which you have 'given us a large earneſt in your Kalendar, as accom'pliſhed as any thing can be expected, from an extra'ordinary wit, and no ordinary expences, and a long 'experience. I know no body that poſſeſſes more pri'vate happineſs than you do in your garden; and, 'yet, no man who makes his happineſs more public, 'by a free communication of the art and knowledge 'of it to others. All that I myſelf am able yet to do, 'is only to recommend to mankind the ſearch of that 'felicity which you inſtruct them how to find and to 'enjoy.

Happy art thou whom God does bleſs
With the full choice of thine own happineſs;
And happier yet, becauſe thou'rt bleſt
With prudence how to chuſe the beſt.
In books and gardens thou haſt plac'd aright,
(Things which thou well doſt underſtand,
And both doſt make with thy laborious hand,)
Thy noble innocent delight.
And in thy virtuous wife, where thou again doſt meet
Both pleaſures more refin'd and ſweet,

Richard Brown (u), who was the companion of his fortunes, and in ſome meaſure alſo of his ſtudies, for almoſt threeſcore years, he had five ſons and three daughters. Of the former, all died young except one, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next article; of the latter, only one ſurvived him, Suſannah, married to William Draper of Adſcomb, in the county of Surrey, Eſq. (w). His excellent widow did not out-live him quite three years, but, dying Feb. 9, 1709, was, according to her own deſire, depoſited in a ſtone coffin, as near as could be to the corpſe of her dead huſband (x). Upon the ſtone coffin, in which the leaden one lies that holds her body, a white marble ſtone is placed of the ſame ſhape, with a very ſhort inſcription (y), which informs us, that, at the time of her demiſe, ſhe was in the ſeventy-fourth year of her age, and that ſhe was eſteemed, admired, beloved, and regretted, by all who knew her (z).

The ingenious and learned Joſeph Glanville (61) gave a high character of our author, when but a very few of his works had appeared. 'Mr. John Evelyn,' ſays he, 'hath very conſiderably advanced the hiſtory 'of fruit and foreſt trees, by his Sylva and Pomona; 'and greater things are expected from his preparations 'for Elyſium Britannicum, a noble deſign, now under 'his hands: and certainly the inquiſitive world is 'much indebted to this generous gentleman for his 'very ingenious performance in this kind: as alſo for 'thoſe others of Sculpture, Picture, Architecture, and 'the like practical uſeful things with which he hath 'inriched it.' But the judicious and reverend Dr. William Wotton ſpeaks more highly of our author, as being acquainted with moſt of his writings; and, in comparing the antient with the modern agriculture, he delivers himſelf thus (62). 'In making my compari-'ſon, I ſhall comprehend all that the Antients under-'ſtood by their Res Ruſtica, as it takes in the foreſter's, 'the huſbandman's, and the gardener's buſineſs: Cato, 'Varro, and Columella, include the grazier's alſo, 'thereby completing the whole body of farming; but, 'ſince his work cannot well be made a ſcience of, I 'ſhall omit it. By a foreſter here, I underſtand one 'that knows how to plant, propagate, and increaſe, 'all ſorts of timber-trees, what ſoils are proper for 'every ſort, how they may beſt be defended from dan-'gers in their growth, to what uſes they are moſt ap-'plicable when they have arrived to their utmoſt per-'fection, and how they may be beſt applied; ſuch 'a man, in ſhort, as Mr. Evelyn inſtructs in his Sylva, 'where he gives a full ſyſtem of the woodman's ſkill, 'what he ought to know, and what to practiſe. A 'great part of his work, and indeed the niceſt part of 'it, the antients were ſtraugers to, as having leſs occa-'ſion for it. The world was then, comparatively 'ſpeaking, in its infancy; there was no want of wood 'for fuel, building, or ſhips, and this plenty made 'men leſs curious in contriving methods of preſerving 'what they had in ſo great abundance. England, till 'within a few ages, was every where over run with 'wood: The Hercynian foreſt, antiently took up what 'is now the moſt flouriſhing part of Germany: and 'France, which is at preſent ſo wonderfully populous 'that little cultivable ground remains untilled, was in 'Cæſar's time over-ſpread with woods and foreſts. As 'men increaſe, tillage becomes more and more requi-'ſite; the conſumption of wood will be proportionably 'greater; and its want, and the neceſſary uſes of tim-'ber, which grow upon men as they become more nu-'merous, will, of conſequence, put them upon ways 'to prevent and increaſe it. Commerce with diſtant 'parts will ſhew men rare and uſeful trees for ſhade 'or fruit; but their induſtry in that particular came 'under another head, as rather belonging to the 'gardener's work. It may therefore, perhaps, be 'eſteemed a ſmall character of Mr. Evelyn's diſcourſe of 'foreſt-trees to ſay, that it out-does all that Theo-'phraſtus and Pliny have left us on that ſubject: for, it 'not only does that and a great deal more, but con-'tains more uſeful precepts, hints, and diſcoveries, 'upon that now ſo neceſſary a part of our Res Ruſtica, 'than the world had till then known, from all the 'obſervations of former ages. To name others after 'him would be a derogation to his performance.' In comparing the antient and modern huſbandman and gardener, he ſpeaks as highly of Mr. Evelyn's "Pomona," and of his "Kalendar," which, however, we will omit. Biſhop Burnet (63), acknowledging ſome communications from him, ſtyles him 'that moſt ingenious 'and virtuous gentleman, Mr. Evelyn, who is not 'ſatisfied to have advanced the knowledge of this age, 'by his own uſeful and ſucceſsful labours about plant-'ing and divers other ways, but is ready to contri-'bute every thing in his power to perfect other men's 'endeavours.' The honourable Roger North ſpeaks thus of his brother the Lord-Keeper Guildford's viſit to our author, and of his manner of living (64). 'His Lordſhip was once invited to a philoſophical 'meal at the houſe of Mr. Evelyn at Deptford. The 'houſe was low, but elegantly ſet off with ornaments, 'and quaint mottos, at moſt turns; but, above all, 'his garden was exquiſite, being moſt boſcareſque, 'and, as it were, an examplar, of his book of foreſt-'trees. They appeared all ſo thriving and clean, 'that, in ſo much variety, no one could be ſatiated in 'viewing; and to theſe were added plenty of ingeni-'ous diſcourſes, which made the time ſhort.' A very critical inquirer into every thing relating to Engliſh hiſtory, the late Lord Biſhop of Carliſle, ſpeaking of his "Numiſmata," beſtows the following character of that book, and its author (65). 'We might 'juſtly have expected whatever could have been de-'ſired on this ſubject, from the excellently learned 'pen of Mr. Evelyn, had he bent his thoughts, as 'was believed, towards the conſideration of our 'Britiſh coins as well as medals. It now appears, 'that his "Numiſmata" carried him no farther than 'thoſe larger and more choice pieces that are uſually 'called by this latter name; whereon he has, indeed, 'treated with that accuracy and fineneſs which be-'came a gentleman and a ſcholar.' Our author's works are alſo very honourably mentioned by ſeveral foreign writers (66), particularly by the judicious Morhoff, who tells us, that ſome of them were tranſlated into Latin. It may prove ſome ſatisfaction to the inquiſitive reader, if we add, that his picture was thrice drawn in oil; firſt, in 1681, by Vanderborcht, a famous artiſt, and brought out of Germany at the ſame time with Wenceſlaus Hollar, the graver, by the Earl of Arundel; a ſecond time, in 1648, by Walker; and, the third time, by Sir Godfrey Kneller, for his friend Mr. Pepys, of the Admiralty; of which that at the Royal Society is a copy. There is a print of him by Nanteüil, in which he is repreſented, in a cloak in his own hair, and under him ſome books marked with the cipher J. E. He likewiſe drew him more than once in black and white, with Indian ink; and there is a picture of him in crayon by Lutterel (67). C.

 [With regard to what is ſaid, in note C, concerning the different characters given of Archbiſhop Laud at Rome, it is obſerved by a correſpondent, that there is no inconſiſtency in theſe accounts. "The "Engliſh fathers, with whom Mr. Evelyn converſed, "might treat Laud as an enemy, and others might "conſider him as a friend. They who ſuppoſed that "Laud's zeal for ſhow, and ceremonies, and the "hierarchy, would approach the church of England, to "the church of Rome would ſpeak well of him; and, "they who might ſuſpect that Laud would ſtop "ſhort, and make the Archbiſhop of Canterbury "ſomething

" ſomething like a patriarch, would ſpeak ill of him. " But, after all, how is it poſſible to gather the real " opinions of Popiſh prieſts from the converſations " which they might chuſe to hold with young Pro- " teſtants?"

The obſervations, at the end of note D, that it is much to be regretted that Mr. Evelyn did not publiſh his travels; that, if they had been publiſhed, we ſhould have ſeen clearly, and in a true light, many things in reference to Italy, which are now very indiſtinctly and partially repreſented; and that we ſhould alſo have met with much new matter never touched before, and of which we ſhall now probably never hear at all; might have ſome appearance of truth at the time when they were made, but can ſcarcely apply to the preſent period. We have lately had a multitude of travels into Italy, of different kinds, and written with different views, ſeveral of which are highly inſtructive and entertaining, and have probably communicated all the information that might have been expected from Mr. Evelyn. Indeed, the number of books of this kind has been ſo great, that we ſhould not be ſurprized if the public ſhould begin to be ſatiated with them.

As to what is remarked, in the text, that tranſlations, whatever may be thought of them, now they are become common, were then very juſtly eſteemed, it may be obſerved, that, when they are well executed, they ſtill continue to be highly valued. The laſt forty or fifty years have produced many excellent tranſlations, eſpecially from the ancients. The verſions, indeed, of modern works, particularly from the French, which are haſtily procured by the bookſellers, are often wretchedly performed. There are, however, perſons, who in this department of literature are entitled to much praiſe.

One can ſcarcely help ſmiling at the extravagant, but elegant, encomium which Mr. Waller has paſſed on our author's eſſay on the firſt book of Lucretius. Mr. Evelyn's tranſlation has been ſuperſeded by Creech, and Creech himſelf is not now greatly read. A new verſion of Lucretius, in numbers more elegant and harmonious than thoſe of Creech, would be an acceptable preſent to the literary world.

The ſcheme in note F diſplays the active mind of Mr. Evelyn, and indicates the manners of the philoſophers of that time, who directed their views to large and noble projects But, if ſuch an inſtitution had ever been formed, it would, in all likelihood, have gradually departed from its principles. The plan, on the whole, is too viſionary to have ſtood the colliſion of human paſſions and human events.

Whatever malignity there was in Marchamont Needham's Tract, mentioned in note G, (and he was not, we believe, incapable of malignity,) it is certain that Charles the Second's character could not bear a ſtrict diſcuſſion. This is now univerſally acknowledged; and Mr. Evelyn himſelf muſt have been convinced of it in the courſe of his ſubſequent life.

A ſecond edition of the "Sculptura" was publiſhed in 1755, containing ſome corrections and additions taken from the margin of the author's printed copy; an etching of his head by Mr. Worlidge; an exact copy of the Mezzotinto done by Prince Rupert, by Mr. Houſton; a tranſlation of all the Greek and Latin paſſages; and Memoirs of Mr. Evelyn's Life. The work had become very ſcarce; being chiefly confined to the libraries of the more curious among the learned. Mr. Walpole has ſpoken of it in terms of reſpect (68).

(68) Catalogue of Engravers, p. 82.

The aſſertion of the text, that the learned efforts of our author, in behalf of ſcience and the polite arts, are not leſs reliſhed now than at the time of their firſt appearance, cannot be conſidered as ſtrictly true. His writings are not totally neglected; ſome of them are ſtill held in reputation; but they have in part been ſuperſeded by later publications.

Mr. Evelyn's Sylva is a capital performance, and juſtly entitles his memory to be held in eſteem. It was a very extraordinary circumſtance, that, before it came to a ſecond edition, it ſhould have been the ſole occaſion of furniſhing the Britiſh dominions with more than two millions of timber-trees, beſides an infinite number of others. A new edition of the "Sylva" was publiſhed, in 1776, by Dr. Andrew Hunter, of York, a gentleman eminently qualified for the undertaking. Under the care of this gentleman the work has appeared with every poſſible advantage. For, not to mention the large handſome quarto page, and the neat letter on which it is printed, or the life of the author, taken from the "Biographical Dictionary," it is enriched by the judicious editor with ample and copious notes, and adorned with a ſet of fine engravings. A head of Mr. Evelyn is prefixed, drawn and engraved by Bartolozzi. Dr. Hunter's edition of the "Sylva" is the ſixth. The ſecond appeared in 1669; and the third in 1679, with great additions and improvements. The editions of 1704, and of 1729, are in as corrupted a ſtate as almoſt any book in the Engliſh language (69).

(69) Monthly Review, Vol. LVII. p. 429, 430.

With reſpect to the "Kalendarium Hortenſe," it may be noticed, that many productions of the kind have ſince appeared, and, no doubt, with great improvements. The name of Miller will not be forgotten by thoſe who have any acquaintance with what has been done in this part of Natural Hiſtory and Cultivation.

In reflecting upon Mr. Evelyn's merit, with regard to the Parian Marbles, it muſt not be omitted, that the antiquity and authenticity of theſe marbles have lately been called in queſtion, in a very ingenious and learned diſſertation upon them, written by Mr. Robertſon. He has been anſwered by Mr. Hewlett and Mr. Gough. It is not our buſineſs, in this place, to decide upon the controverſy.

Concerning Mr. Evelyn's work, entituled, "An " Idea of the Perfection of Painting," it may be remarked, that the knowledge of this ſubject has lately been greatly increaſed in England. This our readers will be fully ſenſible of, when (not to ſpeak of other writers) we mention Mr. Walpole's "Anecdotes " of Painting," Sir Joſhua Reynolds's "Diſcourſes," and Mr. Maſon's "Tranſlation of Freſnoy," with notes.

The praiſes of Mr. Evelyn's "Treatiſe on Navi- " gation and Commerce" ſeem, in note P, to have been carried to exceſs. We need not ſay what a multitude of works have ſince been written upon theſe topics.

Of the "Terra" a new edition was publiſhed, in 1778, by Dr. Hunter, the laſt editor of the "Sylva;" who has much improved the work by judicious and ſelect notes.

Mr. Evelyn's "Numiſmata" has met with ſevere treatment from the pen of Mr. Pinkerton. His account of it is as follows: 'The "Numiſmata, or 'Diſcourſe of Medals, ancient and modern," by Mr. 'Evelyn, was printed in 1697. The ſize is folio, 'and the plan and writing are likewiſe in folio. That 'gentleman's ſtyle is ſo very uncouth and unintelligible, that, while he wrote upon every thing, he ought 'to have written about the black art only; but in 'this work he out-does his former out-doings; for, it is 'impoſſible for any one to know his meaning, if he 'did not know it before. None of his obſervations 'are new, but all tacitly taken from Vico, Le Pois, 'Patin, and Iobert. The plates of Engliſh medals 'are of little uſe now that thoſe of Snelling have appeared. Even they would have been better underſtood had he not added explanations. There is, 'in the Britiſh Muſeum, a copy of this work, corrected by the author, with an original letter prefixed, complaining that the printer had utterly 'mangled and ſpoiled his work, ſo that it is neceſſary 'to give corrections. The corrections are for the 'worſe (70).' Perhaps, ſome of our readers may be diſpoſed to ſuſpect, that Mr. Pinkerton's ſatirical ſpirit has entered into this character. The general reflection on Mr. Evelyn's ſtyle is particularly unjuſt. From the numerous ſpecimens of it, given in the article, it is evident that, if it did not ariſe to the ſtrict accuracy of modern compoſition, it was for the moſt part perſpicuous, flowing, and harmonious.

(70) Pinkerton's Eſſay on Medals, Vol. I. Pref. p. x. xi.

Mr. Granger has ſpoken of our author in very different terms. 'John Evelyn, the Engliſh Peireſc,' ſays this candid and judicious biographer, 'was a 'gentleman of as univerſal knowledge as any of his 'time; and no man was more open and benevolent 'in the communication of it. He was particularly 'ſkilled in gardening, painting, engraving, architecture, and medals; upon all which he has publiſhed

'treatiſes. His book on the laſt of theſe ſciences is 'deſervedly in eſteem; but is inferior to that of Mr. 'Obadiah Walker, on the ſame ſubject. His tranſla-'tion of "An Idea of the Perfection of Painting," 'written in French by Roland Freart, is become very 'ſcarce. His "Sculptura" was compoſed at the 'particular requeſt of his friend, Mr. Robert Boyle. 'But his great work is his "Sylva;" which was the 'firſt book that was publiſhed by order of the Royal 'Society. The author had one of the fineſt gardens 'in the kingdom, and was one of the beſt and hap-'pieſt men in it. He lived to a good but not to an 'uſeleſs old age; and long enjoyed the ſhade of thoſe 'flouriſhing trees which himſelf had planted (71).'

(71) Biographical Hiſtory of England, Vol IV. p. 86—88, ſecond edit.

We ſhall ſubjoin the admirable character which has been drawn of Mr. Evelyn by Mr. Walpole, now Earl of Orford. 'If Mr. Evelyn had not been an 'artiſt himſelf, as I think I can prove, I ſhould yet 'have found it difficult to deny myſelf the pleaſure of 'allotting him a place among the arts he loved, pro-'moted, patronized; and it would be but juſtice to 'inſcribe his name with due panegyric in theſe 'records, as I have once or twice taken the liberty to 'criticize him: but they are trifling blemiſhes com-'pared with his amiable virtues and beneficence; and, 'it may be remarked, that the worſt I have ſaid of 'him is, that he knew more than he always commu-'nicated. It is no unwelcome ſatire to ſay, that a 'man's intelligence and philoſophy is inexhauſtible. 'I mean not to write his life, which may be found 'detailed in the new edition of his "Sculptura," in 'Collins's "Baronetage," in the "General Dictio-'nary," and in the "New Biographical Dictionary;" 'but, I muſt obſerve, that his life, which was ex-'tended to eighty-ſix years, was a courſe of enquiry, 'ſtudy, curioſity, inſtruction, and benevolence. The 'works of the Creator, and the mimic labours of the 'creature, were all objects of his purſuit. He un-'folded the perfection of the one, and aſſiſted the 'imperfection of the other. He adored from exa-'mination; was a courtier that flattered only by in-'forming his prince, and by pointing out what was 'worthy for him to countenance; and was really the 'neighbour of the goſpel, for there was no man that 'might not have been the better for him. Whoever 'peruſes a liſt of his works will ſubſcribe to my 'aſſertion. He was one of the firſt promoters of the 'Royal Society, a patron of the ingenious and indi-'gent; and peculiarly ſerviceable to the lettered 'world; for, beſides his writings and diſcoveries, he 'obtained the Arundelian Marbles for the Univerſity 'of Oxford, and the Arundelian Library for the 'Royal Society. Nor is it the leaſt part of his praiſe, 'that he, who propoſed to Mr. Boyle the erection of a 'Philoſophic College for retired and ſpeculative per-'ſons, had the honeſty to write in defence of active 'life againſt Sir George Mackenzie's "Eſſay on 'Solitude." He knew that retirement in his own 'hands was induſtry, and benefit to mankind; but, 'in thoſe of others, lazineſs and inutility (72).'

(72) Catalogue of Engravers, p. 85, 86.

To this character are added ſatisfactory proofs of Mr. Evelyn's having been an artiſt himſelf. There are, in particular, five ſmall prints of his journey from Rome to Naples, of which he was both the deſigner and engraver. His lady had correſpondent talents; for, ſhe deſigned the frontiſpiece to her huſband's "Eſſay to the Firſt Book of Lucretius (73)."

K.

EVELYN (JOHN), ſon of the former. He was born at his father's houſe at Sayes-Court, near Deptford, January 14, 1654 (a), and was there very tenderly educated in his infancy, being conſidered (after the death of his brother Richard Evelyn, January 27, 1657, who, though but five years of age, was eſteemed a kind of (b) prodigy) as the heir of the family. He was likewiſe univerſally admired for the pregnancy of his parts, which induced his father to ſend him, in 1666, to Oxford, where he remained in the houſe of the moſt ingenious and learned Dr. Ralph Bathurſt, then Preſident of Trinity-College, before he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner, which was in Eaſter-term 1668 (c). It is not clear at what time he left Oxford; but Mr. Wood ſeems to be poſitive that he took no degree there, but returned to his father's houſe, where he proſecuted his ſtudies under the directions of that great man (d). There is, however, good reaſon to believe, that it was during his reſidence in Trinity-College, and when he was not above fifteen years of age, that he wrote that elegant Greek poem which is prefixed to the ſecond edition of the "Sylva," and is a noble proof of the ſtrength of his genius, and wonderful progreſs in learning in the early part of his life. He diſcovered his proficiency ſoon afterwards, both in the learned and modern languages, by his elegant tranſlations (e), as well as his intimate acquaintance with the Muſes, in ſome original poems which were very juſtly admired. Of all theſe the reader will have a farther account in the note [A]. He married Martha, daughter and [A] Will have a farther account in the notes.] If we conſider the father's turn of mind, and how much the young gentleman muſt be obliged to hear and ſee of gardens and plantations, we need not in the leaſt wonder that he ſhould employ his pen firſt upon this ſubject, more eſpecially in the eaſy way of tranſlation, and from a book ſo juſtly as well as generally admired as the French jeſuit's has ever been. The title of our author's little treatiſe was,

I. "Of Gardens, Four Books, firſt written in Latin "Verſe, by Renatus Rapinus; and now made Engliſh "by John Evelyn, Eſq. 1673, 8vo."

His father annexed the ſecond book of this tranſlation to his Sylva; and it muſt be allowed, that as the ſenſe is very faithfully rendered, ſo the poetry is very eaſy and harmonious, more eſpecially if we conſider it as the work of a lad of nineteen. The reader will judge of this from the following ſhort ſpecimen, containing inſtructions for the culture of the cypreſs-tree in gardens, founded upon the fable of the unhappy cataſtrophe of Cypariſſus (1), ſuppoſed to be changed into beautiful evergreen, by intemperate grief or by the power of Apollo, at the youth's own requeſt. What is ſaid of Sylvanus is an improvement of the fiction, as delivered by the ancients.

(1) Rapin of Gardens, B. ii. P. 35.

Though Cypreſſes contiguous well appear,
They better ſhew if planted not ſo near;
And ſince to any ſhape with eaſe they yield,
What bounds more proper to divide a field?
Repine not, Cypariſſus, then in vain,
Since by your change freſh honours you obtain.
Sylvanus and this boy, with equal fire,
Did heretofore a lovely hart admire.
While in the cooler paſtures once it fed,
An arrow, ſhot at random, ſtruck it dead.
But, when the youth the dying beaſt had found,
And knew himſelf the author of the wound,
With never-ceaſing ſorrow he laments,
And on his breaſt his grief and anger vents.

He had by his wife two ſons and three daughters. His eldeſt ſon Richard died an infant at Sayes-Court, as did his eldeſt daughter Martha Mary. His ſecond daughter, Elizabeth, married Simon Harcourt, Eſq. eldeſt ſon and heir of Simon Lord Viſcount Harcourt, Lord High-Chancellor of Great Britain, by whom ſhe became mother to the late Earl Harcourt (g). Jane, his third daughter, died an infant at his houſe in the pariſh of St. Martin's in the Fields, and was interred at Kenſington. John Evelyn, his ſecond and only ſurviving ſon, born at Sayes-Court, March 2, 1681, ſucceeded to his grandfather's eſtate. He was married at Lambeth-chapel, September 18, 1705, to Anne, daughter of Edward Boſcawen, of Worthivil, in the county of Cornwall, Eſq. He was, by Letters Patent, bearing date July 30, 1713, created a Baronet (h). This worthy gentleman, who inherited the virtue and learning, as well as the patrimony of his anceſtors, made ſeveral alterations and additions to the family ſeat at Wotton, in 1717, one of which was the erecting a beautiful library, forty-five feet long, fourteen feet broad, and as many high, for the reception of that large and curious collection of books made by his grandfather, his father, and himſelf (i). He was long one of the Commiſſioners of the Cuſtoms, a Fellow of the Royal Society, and was bleſſed with a numerous poſterity.

This was a tranſlation from the French, and has been eſteemed an entertaining and inſtructive hiſtory. Our author wrote alſo ſeveral poems occaſionally, of which two are printed in a celebrated collection (3).  [EVREMOND (CHARLES DE ST.), a writer, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his talents and productions in polite literature, and who was many years reſident in England, was born at St. Denis le Guaſt, in Lower Normandy, on the firſt of April, 1613. He was the third ſon of Charles de St. Denis, caſtellan or baron of St. Denis le Guaſt; and he took the name of St. Evremond from a manor which was part of the eſtate of his father, and of which he was ſometimes ſtyled lord. He was intended, by his father, for the profeſſion of the law; and, when he was nine years of age, he was ſent to Paris to be bred a ſcholar. He was entered in the ſecond form in the college of Clermont; and continued there four years, during which he went through a courſe of grammar learning and rhetorick (a). He was next ſent to the Univerſity of Caen, in order to ſtudy philoſophy; but he continued there one year only, and then returned to Paris, where he purſued the ſame ſtudy a year longer in the college of Harcourt. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf not only by his application to literature, but by other accompliſhments; and he particularly excelled in fencing, ſo that "St. Evemond's paſs" was famous among thoſe who were ſkilled in that art (b).

When he had paſſed through a courſe of philoſophy, he began to ſtudy the law: but, whether his relations had then other views for him, or that his inclination led him to a military life, he quitted that ſtudy after he had proſecuted it ſomewhat more than a year, and was made an enſign before he had quite attained to the age of ſixteen. After he had ſerved two or three campaigns, he obtained a lieutenant's commiſſion; and, after the ſiege of Landrecy, in 1637, he had the command of a company of foot (c).

M. de St. Evremond diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the army by his politeneſs and wit, as well as by his bravery; and his accompliſhments procured him the eſteem of the Mareſchals d'Etrées and Grammont, of Viſcount Turenne, of the Count de Moiſſens, afterwards Mareſchal de Albret, of Count Palluau, afterwards Mareſchal de Clerembaut, and of the Marquis de Crequi, who alſo became a Mareſchal of France. He had a ſhare in the confidence of theſe diſtinguiſhed noblemen, and they always teſtified their friendſhip towards him. In 1640, M. de St. Evremond was at the ſiege of Arras;

Arras; and, in the enſuing year, he obtained a poſt in the horſe, which gave him freſh opportunities of ſignalizing himſelf. Soon after the Duke of Enguien, afterwards Prince of Condé, became ſo much pleaſed with his converſation, that he made him Lieutenant of his Guards, that he might have him conſtantly near him. He often read with him; and ſometimes communicated to him his moſt ſecret projects, and entruſted him with affairs of the greateſt moment. After the campaign of Rocroy, in 1643, M. de St. Evremond wrote a kind of ſatire againſt the French Academy, which was publiſhed in 1650, and entituled, "The Comedy of the Academicians for reform-"ing the French Tongue [A]."

In 1644, he made the campaign of Fribourg; and the following year he received a dangerous wound at the battle of Notlingen. Being ordered to head a ſquadron, and to poſt himſelf below an eminence which was poſſeſſed by the enemy, he was there expoſed, for three hours together, to all the fire of their ſmall ſhot, and a battery of four field-pieces; ſo that he loſt there moſt of his men, and was himſelf wounded in the left knee. His wound was ſo dangerous, that for ſix weeks he was ſuppoſed to be paſt recovery; but, by the ſkill of his ſurgeons and the excellency of his conſtitution, his cure was at length effected. Thirty years after, however, his wound opened afreſh in London; but, being properly treated, he felt no inconvenience from it, excepting (d) Ib. p. 10,11. that his left leg was ſomewhat weaker than the other (d).

After the taking of Furnes, in 1646, the Duke of Enguien appointed M. de St. Evremond to carry the news of it to Court; and having, at the ſame time, opened to him his deſign of beſieging Dunkirk, charged him to propoſe it to Cardinal Mazarin, and to ſettle with him every thing which was neceſſary for the execution of that undertaking. M. de St. Evremond managed this buſineſs with ſo much dexterity, that he prevailed on the Prime Miniſter to agree to every thing which was required by (e) Ibid. p. 12. the Duke of Enguien (e). But, in 1648, he loſt the poſt which he had near that nobleman, now, by the death of his father, become Prince of Condé. This Prince took great delight in diſcovering what was ridiculous in the characters of his acquaintance; and often indulged himſelf in laughing at their foibles in private, in company with the Count de Moiſſens and M. de St. Evremond. But the Prince of Condé, who took great pleaſure in ridiculing others, was not fond of being ridiculed himſelf. He was informed, that St. Evremond and the Count had found out, that there was ſomewhat ridiculous even in him; that his extreme ſolicitude to diſcover the foibles of others was in itſelf a ſpecies of the ridiculous; and that they ſometimes amuſed themſelves with laughing at his highneſs. This excited in him ſo much reſentment, that he took from M. de St. Evremond the Lieutenancy of his guards, and would have no farther correſpondence with the Count de Moiſſens. It is, however, ſuppoſed, that a reconciliation would have been effected, if they had not been ſeparated by the civil war, which about this time took place in France. When the Prince of Condé returned into France, after the Pyrenean treaty, M. de St. Evremond went to wait upon him, and was very favourably received. The Prince offered him his protection; and after-
(f) Ib. p. 13,14. wards, on ſeveral occaſions, gave him aſſurances of his affection and eſteem (f).

In 1649, M. de St Evremond went into Normandy, to viſit his relations. About this time the parliament of Paris had declared againſt Cardinal Mazarin; and the Duke of Beaufort, the Prince of Conti, and the Duke of Longueville, following their example, the latter retired to his government of Normandy, where he aſſembled the nobility, and very earneſtly endeavoured to prevail on St. Evremond to engage in his party. With this view he was offered the command of the artillery; but this office he declined; and has given a facetious account of his refuſal in a ſatirical piece written by him about this time, entituled, "The Duke of Longueville's Retreat to his Govern-"ment of Normandy." He ſays, "They had a mind to beſtow the command of the

[A] The Comedy of the Academicians, &c.] The title of this piece, in French, at firſt was, "La "Comédie des Académiſtes pour la Réformation de "la langue Françoiſe." St. Evremond afterwards altered and improved it; and the title prefixed to it, in the French edition of his works, is, "Les Acadé-"miciens, Comédie." This piece has never been tranſlated into Engliſh. Chapelain, the French poet, Godeau, Biſhop of Graſſe and Vence, and other members of the French academy, are ridiculed in this comedy, which conſiſts only of three acts. St. Evremond alſo wrote another comedy, which is printed in the French editions of his works, under the title of "Sir Politick Would-be, Comédie, à la "maniere des Anglois." In this piece he introduces an Engliſh knight at Venice, forming ſchemes for the improvement of the Venetian government. One of the knight's plans of improvement was, the appointment of four doges, inſtead of one, for the government of that republic. As the doges of Venice, he remarked, were generally choſen to that office when they were much advanced in age, they were often indiſpoſed, and unfit for public buſineſs; being ſometimes confined to their chambers, and ſometimes to their beds. But, if four doges were elected, then, if even two of them were ſick, two of them would probably be well; and, if it ſhould even happen that three of them ſhould be ill at the ſame time, there would ſtill be one of them capable of doing the buſineſs of the republic. In this piece the different modes of travelling of the French and the Germans are alſo ridiculed. St. Evremond likewiſe wrote another comedy, intitled, "Les Opéras." It does not appear that either of theſe pieces were ever tranſlated into Engliſh.

" ordnance on St. Evremond; and, to ſpeak the truth, conſidering his affection for " St. Germain's (where the King then was), he would have been glad to have ſerved " the Court, by accepting a conſiderable employment, of the buſineſs of which he " knew nothing. But, having promiſed Count de Harcourt to take no employment, " he kept his word, not only from a principle of honour, but that he might not be " like the Normans, moſt of whom had broken their promiſe. From theſe conſidera- " tions, he was induced generouſly to refuſe the money that was offered to him, but " which would never have been paid him (g)."

(g) Oeuvres Mêlées de M. de Saint Evremond, tome I. p. 42, 43. edit. 12mo. Cologne, 1708.

When the civil war broke out, the French King, being acquainted with St. Evremond's merit and bravery, and knowing that he had conſtantly refuſed to join with thoſe who were in oppoſition to the Court, made him a Mareſchal de Camp, or Major-General. His commiſſion was dated Sept. 6, 1652; and the next day he received a warrant for a penſion of three thouſand livres a year. He ſerved afterwards in the war of Guienne, under the Duke of Candale; but, after the reduction of Guienne, he was committed to the Baſtile, where he was confined as a priſoner two or three months. Some jeſts that had been thrown out, relative to Cardinal Mazarin, in a company wherein St. Evremond was preſent, but in which he had no greater ſhare than the reſt, were the pretence for his confinement. But the true reaſon of it was ſuppoſed to be, a ſuſpicion that he had given ſome advice to the Duke of Candale which was inconſiſtent with the Cardinal's views. However, when St. Evremond obtained his liberty, he went, conformably to the ſervile manners that prevailed under the old government of France, to return thanks to the Cardinal for his enlargement. Mazarin told him on this occaſion, that " he was perſuaded of his innocence, but that a man in his ſta- " tion was obliged to hearken to ſo many reports, that it was very difficult for him to " diſtinguiſh between truth and falſehood, and not ſometimes to do injuſtice to an " honeſt man (b)."

(b) Des Maizeaux, ut ſupra, p. 18.

In 1654, M. de St. Evremond ſerved in Flanders; and about three years after fought a duel with the Marquis de Fore. He continued in the ſervice in Flanders till the ſuſpenſion of arms, which was agreed upon between France and Spain in 1659. The following year, he came over into England with Count de Soiſſons, who was ſent on an embaſſy to congratulate Charles II. on the reſtoration; and, when Cardinal Mazarin ſet out from Paris with a great retinue, in order to negociate a treaty with the firſt Miniſter of the King of Spain, St. Evremond was one of thoſe who accompanied him. He afterwards ſent a letter concerning the conferences to the Marquis de Crequi, in which he informed him, that the Cardinal had ſacrificed the honour and intereſts of France to his own private views. In one part of this letter he ſaid, " It is the Cardinal's maxim, " that a miniſter does not ſo much belong to the ſtate as the ſtate to the miniſter; " and, for this reaſon, if God grant him but a few years, he will get all the eſtates in " the kingdom into his own hands (i)."

(i) Ibid. p. 28.

This letter of St. Evremond, concerning the Pyrenean treaty, became the occaſion of his baniſhment from France. After the death of the Cardinal, a copy of the letter fell into the hands of ſome of the courtiers who had been connected with him. They repreſented to his Majeſty the danger of allowing private men to judge of ſtate affairs and to cenſure the conduct of miniſters. Their repreſentations made ſuch an impreſſion on the mind of Lewis, that he immediately ordered M. de St. Evremond to be committed to the Baſtile. But St. Evremond had no inclination to pay a ſecond viſit to that fortreſs; and, therefore, having received private information of the deſign, found means to make his eſcape out of France, and arrived in Holland about the end of the year 1661 (k).

(k) Ibid. p. 38.

He did not continue long in Holland, but went over to England in 1662, and was well received at the Britiſh Court. He particularly numbered among his friends the Dukes of Buckingham and Ormond, the Earls of St. Alban's and Arlington, Lord D'Aubigny and Lord Crofts [B]. He alſo cultivated the acquaintance of thoſe perſons in England who were the moſt eminent for literature; and often converſed with Mr. Hobbes, Sir Kenelm Digby, Mr. Cowley, and Mr. Waller [C]. In England, he

[B] Numbered among his friends the Dukes of Buckingham and Ormond, &c.] Mr. Des Maizeaux, after obſerving that St. Evremond was extremely fond of the converſation of Lord D'Aubigny, ſays, 'The 'Duke of Buckingham, my Lord D'Aubigny, and 'he, were together almoſt every day, and their con- 'verſation was often upon theatrical performances. 'M. de St. Evremond not underſtanding the Engliſh 'tongue, thoſe gentlemen acquainted him with the beſt 'dramatic pieces compoſed in that language; of which 'he retained ſo clear an idea, that forty years after he 'remembered them very diſtinctly. The reading of 'them furniſhed him with the reflections he has made 'upon the Engliſh tragedies and comedies in ſome of 'his works (1).'

(1) Life, ut ſupra, p. 40.

[C] And Mr. Waller.] Dr. Johnſon ſays of Mr. Waller, in his life of him, 'The praiſe given him by 'St. Evremond is a proof of his reputation; for, it was 'only by his reputation that he could be known, as a 'writer, to a man who, though he lived a great part 'of a long life upon an Engliſh penſion, never con- 'deſcended to underſtand the language of the nation 'that maintained him (2).' It ſeems hardly probable, that St. Evremond could be ſo many years in England without being enabled in ſome degree to read the language, though he might not underſtand it accurately, or attempt to ſpeak it. But, as Waller ſpoke French, St. Evremond might form a very juſt idea of his intellectual abilities from his converſation; for, even Clarendon, who was no friend to Waller, ſpeaks of 'the excellence and power of his wit, and 'the pleaſantneſs of his converſation.'

(2) Life of Waller, p. 61, 62.

wrote many literary pieces, which were afterwards printed. In 1665, he was ſeized with a diſorder, which threw him into a kind of melancholy, and greatly weakened him. His phyſicians told him, that nothing but a change of air could cure him; and that, if he could not go to Montpelier, he would at leaſt do well to croſs the ſea, and make ſome ſtay in Holland. He complied with this advice; and liked his ſituation in Holland ſo well, that he thought of ſpending the remainder of his life in that country. In a letter written about this time to the Marquis de Crequi, he ſays, "After having "lived in the conſtraint of courts, I conſole myſelf with the hope of ending my days "in the freedom of a republic, where, if nothing is to be hoped for, there is at leaſt "nothing to be feared. It would be diſgraceful to a young man not to enter the "world with a deſign of making his fortune: but, when we are upon the decline, na- "ture calls us back to ourſelves; and, the ſentiments of ambition yielding to the love "of our repoſe, we find it agreeable to live in a country, where the laws guard us "againſt any ſubjection to the will of others; and where, to be ſecure of all, we need "only be ſecure of ourſelves. To this bleſſing we may add, that the magiſtrates have "great authority in their offices for the intereſts of the public; but are little diſtin- "guiſhed in their perſons by any particular privileges or advantages. You ſee here "none of thoſe odious diſtinctions, which are ſo offenſive to men of real good breed- "ing; no uſeleſs dignities, or inconvenient degrees of rank; none of that cumbrous "greatneſs, which reſtrains liberty, without advancing one's fortune. Here the "magiſtrates procure our repoſe, without expecting any acknowledgment, or even "any expreſſions of reſpect for the ſervices that they render to us. They are rigorous "in the execution of the orders of the ſtate; firm and unaccommodating in the manage- "ment of the intereſt of their country with foreign nations; mild and tractable with "their fellow-citizens; and eaſy with all ſorts of private perſons. The foundation of "equality remains, notwithſtanding the exerciſe of authority; and, therefore, credit "never makes a man inſolent, nor do the governors ever bear hard on thoſe that "are governed." Speaking of the ſtate of Religion in Holland, he ſays, "The dif- "ference of religion, which in other places raiſes ſo many commotions, here does not "in the leaſt diſturb the minds of men. Every one ſeeks the road to Heaven in his "own way; and thoſe who are thought to go aſtray are more pitied than hated, and "only excite in others a pure charity, totally devoid of the indiſcretion of falſe "zeal (l)."

(l) Oeuvres Mêleés de M. de St. Evremond, tome II. p. 163, 164. Cologne, 12mo. 1708.

During his ſtay in Holland, St. Evremond became acquainted with moſt of the foreign miniſters and perſons of diſtinction there; and alſo viſited ſeveral eminent literary men, who happened then to be at the Hague; particularly Heinſius, Voſſius, and Spinoza. Of the latter he gave the following account to Mr. Des Maizeaux: "He "was," ſaid he, "of a middle ſtature, and pleaſing countenance. His learning, mo- "deſty, and diſintereſtedneſs, made him eſteemed by all the ingenious perſons then at "the Hague. It did not appear, from his ordinary converſation, that he had thoſe "ſentiments which were afterwards found in his poſthumous works (m)." About the year 1667, ſome applications were made to the French King, by means of M. de St. Evremond's friends, particularly of the Marquis de Lionne, to induce that monarch to permit him to return to his own country: but theſe applications were not ſucceſsful [D]. In 1668, the Prince of Tuſcany arrived in Holland; and, as he deſigned to make ſome ſtay at the Hague, he hired a houſe there. But it happened, that, in the houſe which was taken for him, M. de St. Evremond had an apartment, as had alſo ſome other perſons of diſtinction. They were, therefore, obliged to ſeek for other lodgings; but, when St. Evremond was preparing to remove like the reſt, the Prince not only deſired him to ſtay, but likewiſe to uſe his table whilſt he continued at the Hague. He alſo ever afterwards teſtified his eſteem for him, and ſent him every year a preſent of ſome of the beſt Italian wines (n).

(m) Life, p. 56.

(n) Ibid. p. 66.

St. Evremond now thought of paſſing the remainder of his days in Holland; but, in 1670, Sir William Temple delivered to him letters from the Earl of Arlington, by which he was informed, that King Charles II. deſired his return to England. This induced him to change his intentions; and, on his arrival in England, the King conferred on him a penſion of three hundred pounds a year (o). In 1675, the Dutcheſs of Mazarin arrived in England; and, we are told, that "her houſe was the uſual "rendezvous of the politeſt perſons in England; and in theſe aſſemblies the people of "faſhion found an agreeable amuſement, and the learned an excellent pattern of "politeneſs (p)." It is added, that, in her houſe, "all manner of ſubjects were diſ- "courſed upon, as philoſophy, religion, hiſtory, pieces of wit and gallantry, plays,

[D] Theſe applications were not ſucceſsful.] Des Maizeaux, ſpeaking of this diſappointment, ſays, 'In 'the mean while, he did what he could to make 'himſelf eaſy in a diſagreeable ſituation. Happily 'for him, he loved learning, reflected on what he 'had read, and knew how to write. A man of 'letters never knows the plague of idleneſs. " and authors antient and modern (q)." St. Evremond ſpent much of his time at the houſe of the Dutcheſs of Mazarin [E], and appears to have had a great friendſhip for her. He was alſo on very friendly terms with the celebrated Ninon de l'Enclos, with whom he often correſponded [F]. St. Evremond ſometimes paſſed the ſummer ſeaſon

(q) Ibid. p. 95.

[E] The Dutcheſs of Mazarin.] Mr. Granger obſerves of this celebrated lady, whoſe name was Hortenſia Mancini, that ſhe 'was, by permiſſion of 'Lewis XIV. heireſs to the title, arms, and eſtate 'of her uncle, the famous Cardinal Mazarin; all 'which ſhe transferred, by a marriage-contract, to 'the Duke of Meilleraye, whom ſhe eſpouſed. She 'poſſeſſed every qualification that could inſpire love, 'and appears to have been extremely ſuſceptible of 'the paſſion herſelf. Having quarrelled with the 'Duke her huſband, ſhe came into England, flushed 'with the conqueſts ſhe had made in her own country. She had evidently a deſign upon Charles II. 'and was regarded as a moſt formidable rival to 'the Ducheſs of Portſmouth. It is ſaid, that a diſcovery of an intrigue, in which ſhe imprudently engaged ſoon after ſhe came over, prevented her gaining the aſcendant in the royal favour. The king, however, aſſigned her an annual penſion of four thouſand pounds. She lived many years at Chelſea, 'where her houſe was daily reſorted to by the witty, 'the gallant, and polite. St. Evremond, her avowed 'admirer, has drawn her character to great advantage; indeed, ſo great, that we preſently ſee his 'paſſions were too much engaged for a candid hiſtorian. He could ſcarcely think that ſo angelic a 'creature had any foibles, much leſs that ſhe had 'vices which would have diſgraced the meaneſt of her 'ſex (4).'

(4) Biog. Hiſt. of England, Vol. IV. p. 196, 197. edit. 8vo. 1775.

In a character of the Dutcheſs of Mazarin, written by St. Evremond, he ſays, 'I am unjuſtly accuſed of 'having too great a partiality for Madame Mazarin: 'for, in truth, there is no perſon that ſhe has greater 'reaſon to complain of than myſelf. For ſix months 'together I have been maliciouſly ſpying out ſomething in her, which might diſpleaſe me; but, in 'ſpite of all my endeavours, I could diſcover nothing 'that was not too lovely and too charming.'—'I 'have ſeen ſome ladies that have made conqueſts by 'the advantage of their beauty, and loſt them again 'through a defect of wit. I have ſeen others that engaged us to them by being beautiful and witty 'together; but diſcouraged us from a farther purſuit 'by their indiſcretion, fickleneſs, and avarice. But, 'in Madame Mazarin, if you paſs from her face to 'her wit, from the qualities of her mind to thoſe of 'her ſoul, you will find that every thing attracts you, 'that every thing faſtens and binds you, and that 'nothing can diſengage you. We defend ourſelves 'from the charms of other ladies by our reaſon: but, 'tis reaſon that ſubjects us to her power. With other 'ladies, our love generally begins where our reaſon 'ends: here our love cannot end, unleſs we loſe our 'reaſon (5).'

(5) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 250, 252.

It is ſaid, that the fortune which the Ducheſs brought to her huſband was 1,625,000l. ſterling, and that by this marriage he became the richeſt ſubject in Europe (6). She lived, however, to be deſtitute of money to pay her debts; and was, for many years, ſupported by an Engliſh penſion. She eloped from her huſband in 1667. Monſ. Herard was employed as an advocate againſt her in one of the courts of Paris, by the Duke of Mazarin, who petitioned the court, 'That, during the unjuſt elopement of the 'Dutcheſs, and her obſtinacy in abſenting herſelf from 'her houſe, and from the kingdom, ſhe ſhould be 'deprived and diveſted of her dower, and right of 'alimony; and that it might be lawful for him to 'ſeize her wherever he could find her, and to cauſe 'her to be conducted to his own houſe.' The pleadings of Herard againſt the Dutcheſs were publiſhed, and afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh, with a reply by St. Evremond, and printed in 8vo. in 1699.

(6) Preface to the Arguments of Monſieur Herard for the Duke of Mazarin, Lond. 8vo. 1699.

It is ſaid, in the pleadings againſt the Dutcheſs, that ſhe 'made it one of the ordinary diverſions of 'her youth to throw bags of gold away by handfuls, 'out of the windows of the palace of Mazarin, for 'the pleaſure of ſetting the mob together by the 'ears (7).' Her huſband is repreſented as a man of extreme ſuperſtition. As an inſtance of it, it is ſaid, in St. Evremond's reply to Herard, that, 'he cauſed 'one of Madame de Richelieu's children to be brought 'up, with expreſs prohibition to the nurſe from 'ſucking it on Fridays and Saturdays; that, inſtead 'of milk, it might ſuck in the holy rule of faſting and 'mortification (8).' In the ſame piece it is obſerved, that true Chriſtians render good for evil; but the Duke of Mazarin, who affected to be very devout, left a wife to ſtarve, who brought him 'a greater 'fortune than all the queens of Europe together 'brought to the kings their huſbands (9).'

Des Maizeaux ſays, 'The Dutcheſs of Mazarin 'uſed to ſpend the fine ſeaſon at Chelſea, a village 'on the Thames, three miles from London, which 'was at that time the rendezvous of thoſe perſons that 'paid their court to her. M de St. Evremond was 'very aſſiduous in his viſits. There they enjoyed the 'innocent diverſions of the country. But, in 1699, 'an end was put to all thoſe pleaſures. Madam 'Mazarin fell ſick in the beginning of June that 'year, and died on the 22d of the ſame month, aged 'about fifty-three. She preſerved her beauty to the 'laſt. Time, which conſumes every thing, had a reſpect for her charms (10).'

Mr. Granger remarks, that the print which is given for the Dutcheſs of Mazarin, in the Engliſh tranſlation of St. Evremond's works, is a copy from Lombart's print of the Dutcheſs of York (11).

(11) Biog. Hiſt. ut ſupra.

It appears, that, at the time of the Dutcheſs of Mazarin's death, ſhe was four hundred guineas in debt to St. Evremond; but he declared, in one of his letters, that he 'mourned for the loſs of her every 'day;' and, he added, that 'the conſideration of 'what ſhe owed him had no part of his com'plaints (12).'

[F] Ninon de l'Enclos, with whom he often correſponded.] In one of this lady's letters to him, ſhe ſays, 'The 'Count de Clerembaut gave me a ſenſible pleaſure, 'when he told me that you thought of me; which I 'really deſerve, becauſe of my conſtant affection to 'you. We ſhall deſerve the praiſes of poſterity for 'the duration of our lives, and that of our friendſhip. 'I fancy I ſhall live as long as you. I am ſometimes weary with doing always the ſame thing, and 'I commend the Swiſs who drowned himſelf for that 'reaſon. My friends often check me on this ſcore; 'and aſſure me, that life is deſirable, ſo long as we 'enjoy tranquillity and a ſound mind (13).' In another letter to him, ſhe ſays, 'Your letters perſuade 'me, that England promiſes you forty years more of 'life: for, I think that it is in England only that they 'talk of people who have lived beyond the age of 'man. I could have wiſhed to have paſſed the remainder of my life with you. Had you thought in 'the ſame way that I do, you would be in this 'country now (14).' In one of his letters to her, St. Evremond ſays, 'Every thing contributes to make 'me regret the happy time which I have ſpent in 'your company, and to deſire in vain to ſee you once 'more. I have not ſtrength enough to tranſport myſelf over to France, and you have allurements there 'which will hinder you from coming to England. 'The Dutcheſs of Bouillon can tell you that England 'has its charms; and I ſhould be ungrateful myſelf, 'if I did not own that I have met with pleaſures and 'comforts in it.'—'What I find the moſt troubleſome at this age is, that hope is loſt; hope, which 'is the ſweeteſt of all the paſſions, and that which 'contributes moſt to make us paſs our time agreeably. 'That which gives me the greateſt pain is my deſpairing ever to ſee you: I muſt ſit down ſatisfied 'with writing to you ſometimes, in order to keep up 'a friendſhip, which has reſiſted the length of time, 'the diſtance of place, and the uſual coldneſs of old 'age. ſeaſon with the Court at Windſor, where he converſed much with Iſaac Voſſius, who had been made one of the prebendaries of Windſor by King Charles II. By the death of that Prince, St. Evremond loſt his penſion; but, in 1686, the Earl of Sunderland propoſed to King James II. to create for him an office of Secretary of the Cabinet, whoſe province ſhould be to write the King's private letters to foreign princes. The King agreed to the propoſal, but St. Evremond declined accepting the office. He made his acknowledgments to Lord Sunderland, and to the King; and ſaid, "he "ſhould account himſelf very happy to be able to ſerve his Majeſty; but that a man "of his age ought to think of nothing, but how to huſband the little time he had to "live, and to ſpend it in eaſe and tranquillity (r)." After the Revolution, he was ſo well treated in England by King William [G], that he declined returning again to his own country, though the French King now gave him permiſſion [H], and even promiſed him a favourable reception (s). About the year 1693, the Abbot de Chaulieu ſent a poem to the Dutcheſs of Mazarin, accompanied with a letter in verſe, which contained a high compliment to St. Evremond, whom he compared to Ovid. St. Evremond made ſome remarks on the Abbot's poetical epiſtle, in which he objected to the compariſon between himſelf and the Roman poet. "Ovid," ſaid he, "was the "moſt witty and the moſt unfortunate man of his time. I am not like him, either "as to wit or misfortunes. He was exiled among barbarians, where he made fine "verſes; but ſo doleful and melancholy, that they excite as much contempt for his "weakneſs as compaſſion for his diſgrace. Where I am, I daily ſee the Dutcheſs of "Mazarin. I live among ſociable people, who have a great deal of merit and a "great deal of wit. I make very indifferent verſes; but ſo gay, that they make my "humour to be envied, while they make my poetry to be laughed at. I have too "little money; but I love to be in a country where there is enough: beſides, the uſe "of it ends with our lives; and the conſideration of a greater evil is a ſort of remedy "againſt a leſſer. Thus you ſee I have ſeveral advantages over Ovid. It is true, that "he was more fortunate at Rome with Julia than I have been at London with Hortenſia: but the favours of Julia were the occaſion of his misfortune; and the rigours of Hortenſia do not make a man of my age uneaſy (t)."

(t) Ibid. p. 135, 136.

St. Evremond was a kind of Epicurean philoſopher; but, though his ſpeculative morality was too lax, yet in his general conduct he appears to have acted like a man of probity. He preſerved his health and his chearfulneſs to a very great age. In one of his letters to Ninon de l'Enclos he ſays, "At eighty eight years of age, I eat oiſters "every morning. I dine heartily, and ſup tolerably. Heroes are celebrated for leſs "merit than mine (u)." He was at length afflicted with a ſtrangury, which was attended with great pain, and by which he was much weakened. Bayle tells us, in one of his letters, that it was publicly known, that St. Evremond uſed no aſſiſtance of miniſter or prieſt to prepare him for death; and that it was ſaid, that the Envoy from the Court of Florence ſent to him an eccleſiaſtic, who, aſking him whether he would be reconciled, received for anſwer, "With all my heart: I would fain be reconciled "to my ſtomach, which no longer performs its uſual functions." Bayle alſo ſays, "I have ſeen verſes, which he wrote fifteen days before his death; and his only regret "was, that he was reduced to boiled meats, and could no longer digeſt partridges and "pheaſants." He died on the 9th of September, 1703, aged ninety years, five months, and twenty days (w). Des Maizeaux ſays, 'He preſerved, to the very laſt, a lively

'gin with you to ſhew, that it is poſſible not to grow 'old (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 431, 432.

St. Evremond related, that, in the earlier part of her life, Ninon once told him, that 'ſhe returned 'God thanks every night for her wit; and 'prayed him, every morning, to preſerve her from 'the follies of her heart (16).'

(16) Life, p. 92, 93.

[G] Well treated in England by King William.] Des Maizeaux ſays, 'The Revolution, which raiſed 'the Prince of Orange to the throne of Great Britain, 'was advantageous to Monſ. de St. Evremond. That 'Prince had been very kind to him in Holland; and, 'when he came to be King of England, gave him 'very ſubſtantial marks of his favour. He often took 'him into his parties of pleaſure; and loved to converſe with him, and to hear him talk of the great 'captains that he had ſeen in France, and of the 'military tranſactions to which he had been witneſs (17).'

(17) Ibid. p. 131.

[H] The French King now gave him permiſſion.] We are told, that 'M. de St. Evremond thought of 'nothing but ending his days in peace in England, 'when he received letters from the Count de Grammont, acquainting him, that the King of France 'had declared, that he might return, and ſhould be 'well received. His Majeſty, perceiving that a war 'was breaking out between the two nations, thought 'it would be dangerous for M. de St. Evremond to 'ſtay with a people exaſperated againſt France: but 'his merit had acquired him the general eſteem and 'good will of the Engliſh. The Count de Grammont 'congratulated him upon the favourable regard the 'King had for him, and deſired him to haſten his 'return: but they were very much ſurprized, when 'they ſaw he had no mind to leave England. He 'anſwered the Count de Grammont, that he had a deep 'ſenſe of gratitude for the favour his Majeſty intended 'him, and would have readily accepted it, were he 'in a condition to enjoy it; but that the infirmities 'almoſt inſeparable from old age would not permit 'him to undertake ſuch a journey, and to leave a 'country where he lived very agreeably (18).'

(18) Ibid. p. 132.

Voltaire, in his "Age of Lewis XIV." ſays, 'when Lewis XIV. permitted St. Evremond to return to his country, towards the latter end of his 'life, this philoſopher ſcorned to accept the permiſſion as a favour; and proves that a man's 'country is the place where he lives happily; and he 'did ſo at London.' He alſo obſerves, that St. Evremond in England 'lived and died a freeman and 'a philoſopher.'

'imagina-

'imagination, a ſolid judgment, and a happy memory. The great and acute pains, 'which he felt during his ſickneſs, never diſturbed his tranquillity. He bore them 'with a courage and conſtancy that may be envied by philoſophers of the firſt rate (x).' (x) Ibid. p. 153.

The ſame writer gives the following deſcription of his perſon: 'M. de St. Evremond 'had blue, lively, and ſparkling, eyes, a large forehead, thick eye-brows, a hand-'ſome mouth, and a ſneering phyſiognomy. Twenty years before his death, a wen 'grew between his eye-brows, which in time increaſed to a conſiderable bigneſs. He 'once deſigned to have it cut off; but, as it was no ways troubleſome to him, and he 'little regarded that kind of deformity, Dr. Le Fevre adviſed him to let it alone, leſt 'ſuch an operation ſhould be attended with dangerous ſymptoms in a man of his age. 'He would often make merry with himſelf on account of his wen, his great leather 'cap, and grey hair, which he choſe to wear rather than a periwig (y).' Des Mai- (y) Id. ibid.
zeaux afterwards adds, 'His behaviour was civil and engaging, his converſation lively 'and pleaſant, his repartees quick and happy. We find very few that know how to 'read well. M. de St. Evremond told me one day, that he had not known three in his 'whole life that could read juſtly. He had this art in perfection; and, what is altoge-'ther as uncommon, he had a very happy way of telling a ſtory (z).'—'His humour (z) Ibid. p. 154.
'was ever gay and merry; which was ſo far from declining towards the latter end of 'his life, that it ſeemed rather to gather freſh ſtrength.'—'He was extremely fond of 'the company of young people, and delighted to hear the ſtories of their adventures.' —'Although he did not pretend to over-rigid morals, yet he had all the qualities of 'a man of honour. He was juſt, generous, and grateful; and full of goodneſs and 'humanity (a).' (a) Ibid. p. 155.

St. Evremond alſo drew his own character, in a letter to the count de Grammont. It is as follows: 'He was a philoſopher equally removed from ſuperſtition and from 'impiety; a voluptuary, who had no leſs averſion from debauchery than inclination 'for pleaſure: a man who had never felt the preſſure of indigence, and who had ne-'ver been in poſſeſſion of affluence. He lived in a condition deſpiſed by thoſe who 'have every thing, envied by thoſe who have nothing, and reliſhed by thoſe who 'make their reaſon the foundation of their happineſs. When he was young, he hated 'profuſion, being perſuaded that ſome degree of wealth was neceſſary for the conve-'niencies of a long life. When he was old, he could hardly endure oeconomy; be-'ing of opinion, that want is little to be dreaded when a man has but little time left 'to be miſerable. He was well pleaſed with nature, and did not complain of fortune. 'He hated vice, was indulgent to frailties, and lamented misfortunes. He ſought not 'after the failings of men with a deſign to expoſe them; he only found what was ri-'diculous in them for his own amuſement. He had a ſecret pleaſure in diſcovering 'this himſelf; and would, indeed, have had a ſtill greater in diſcovering this to others, 'had he not been checked by diſcretion. Life, in his opinion, was too ſhort to 'read all ſorts of books, and to burden one's memory with a multitude of things at 'the expence of one's judgment. He did not apply himſelf to the moſt learned 'writings, in order to acquire knowledge; but to the moſt rational, to fortify his rea-'ſon. He ſometimes choſe the moſt delicate, to give delicacy to his own taſte; and 'ſometimes the moſt agreeable, to give the ſame turn to his own genius. It remains 'that he ſhould be deſcribed ſuch as he was in friendſhip and in religion. In friend-'ſhip he was more conſtant than a philoſopher, and more ſincere than a young man of 'good nature without experience. With regard to religion, his piety conſiſted more 'in juſtice and charity than in penance or mortification. He placed his confidence 'in God, truſting in his goodneſs, and hoping, that, in the boſom of his providence, 'he ſhould find his repoſe and his felicity (b).' (b) Vie de M. de St. Evremond, p. 84, 85.

He was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey [I], where a monument was erected to his memory by his friends, on which is his buſt, with the following inſcription:

"CAROLUS

[I] Interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey.] Of his death and burial the following notice is taken, in a letter from Dr. Atterbury, afterwards Biſhop of Rocheſter, to Biſhop Trelawny. 'Mr. St. Evremond died re-'nouncing the Chriſtian religion. Yet the church of 'Weſtminſter thought fit, in honour to his memory, 'to give his body room in the Abbey, and to allow 'him to be buried there gratis, as far as the chapter 'were concerned, though he left eight hundred 'pounds ſterling behind him; which is thought 'every way an unaccountable piece of management. 'Sartré buried him roundly, and hoped that his 'brother would riſe to life eternal. Dr. Birch proffered to be at the charge of the funeral, on account 'of the old acquaintance between St. Evremond and 'his father Waller; but, that proffer not being 'accepted, is reſolved to have the honour of laying a 'marble ſtone upon his grave (19).' In this paſſage the bigotry of Atterbury is ſufficiently apparent. It may alſo be obſerved, that he had probably no other ground for ſaying, that "St. Evremond died renoun-"cing the Chriſtian religion," but his declining the aſſiſtance of any prieſt, or clergyman, to prepare him for death. This was alone ſufficient to ſhock the high prejudices of Atterbury; and it muſt be allowed to be a very alarming circumſtance, that the chapter of Weſtminſter ſhould agree to bury an ingenious and celebrated foreigner in their cathedral without claiming their fees. Such an inattention to the revenues of the church might well be thought deſerving of very ſevere cenſure. (19) Miſcellaneous Works of Bp. Atterbury, with Hiſtorical Notes by J. Nichols, 2d edit. The works of St. Evremond conſiſt of a variety of eſſays and letters, containing many ingenious and acute remarks on polite literature, and on life and manners, together with poems, and ſeveral dramatic pieces. He poſſeſſed a conſiderable degree of wit and humour, and great knowledge of the world. He appears to have had a very intimate acquaintance with Roman literature; but acknowledged that he did not underſtand the Greek language (c). His works in French have paſſed through many editions, and been printed in different ſizes. One edition is in two volumes, 4to. and ſome of the editions are in ſeven volumes, 12mo. An Engliſh tranſlation of ſome of his works was publiſhed in two volumes, 8vo. in 1700; and a tranſlation of ſome other of his pieces in 1705, in one volume, 8vo. under the title of "The Poſthumous "Works of M. de St. Evremond, containing variety of elegant Eſſays, Letters, Poems, "and other miſcellaneous Pieces on ſeveral curious Subjects." Another tranſlation, in two volumes, 8vo. was publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux, in 1714, with a dedication to Lord Halifax [K]. But the beſt edition was publiſhed by the ſame editor, with the life of the author prefixed, in three volumes, 8vo, in 1728. This tranſlation, however, does not contain our author's poems, nor his dramatic pieces.]

I have 'given the Biſhop this night (by a ſure hand) notice 'of it, that he may not ſay he was ſurprized into a 'conſent, which will indeed be very ſcandalous (20).' From what is here ſaid, it is probable, that ſome paſſage was inſerted in the epitaph as originally written, which was afterwards omitted.

By his will, St. Evremond left 20l. to the poor French refugees; and the ſame ſum to 'the poor 'Roman Catholics, or of any other religion.' His manuſcripts he left to Dr. Sylveſtre. The Earl of Galway was his executor (21).

[K] With a dedication to Lord Halifax.] In this dedication, Mr. Des Maizeaux ſays, 'To publiſh in 'Engliſh the works of Monſ. de St. Evremond is, 'if I may ſo ſay, no more than reſtoring to England 'that which of right belonged to it before. It was 'in this happy country that he wrote the greateſt 'part of them, during an abode of forty years; and 'England ſeems to have gained thereby the right of 'looking upon his productions as thoſe of one of its 'own authors. They only wanted to appear in the 'language of the country to which they owe their 'birth, and, perhaps, even their greateſt beauties; 'ſince they contain ſuch bold and lively ſtrokes as 'are peculiar only to the writers of a free nation. 'And, indeed, liberty inſpires a noble and elevated 'confidence, which naturally enlarges the mind, and 'gives it an emulation that inclines it to trace out 'new roads towards attaining the ſciences; whereas 'a ſervile dependence terrifies the ſoul, and fills the 'mind with a timorous circumſpection, that renders 'it mean and groveling, and even debars the uſe of 'its moſt refined talents. Greece and Italy never had 'illuſtrious writers but whilſt they preſerved their 'liberty: the loſs of that was followed by the decay 'of wit, and the ruin of polite learning. Greece, 'formerly the ſeat of the muſes, is now involved in a 'frightful barbarity, under the ſlavery of the Ottoman empire; and Italy, which, under the influence 'of a Roman ſenate, was ſo fruitful in great and 'learned men, now ſubject to the tribunal of the 'inquiſition, produces no conſiderable works of eru'dition or politeneſs.']

He was brought up to trade, and became ſo conſiderable a merchant, that he was choſen one of the Aldermen of that illuſtrious city. In the ninth of Henry VII, namely, in part of the years 1493 and 1494, he had the honour of being one of the Sheriffs of the ſame (c). He was a perſon of learning for the times he lived in, and had ſome ſkill in poetry, both in Engliſh, Latin, and French (d) [A]. [C] A chronicle, which was printed after his deceaſe.] It was firſt printed at London in 1516. fol. by R. Pynſon; and afterwards by William Raſtell, 1533, fol. in neat and ſmall black types, and on good paper. At the concluſion of each part, there is a hymn to the Virgin Mary [omitted in the following editions.] And, at the end of all, 'Thus endeth 'Fabyans Chronicle. Printed by W. Raſtell, and fy-'nyſhed the laſt daye of December, in the yere of 'our Lorde. M. V. C. and XXXIII.' There are alſo, at the end, five leaves, which bring down the Hiſtory to the beginning of King Henry VIII. but are omitted in ſubſequent editions, particularly in the year 1559, now before us. The whole work is divided into two volumes: whereof the firſt begins at Brute, and ends at the death of our King Henry II. and Philip II. King of France. The ſecond volume, which is the moſt valuable of the two, contains the Chronicles of England and of France, from the beginning of the reign of Richard I. until the end of the reign of Charles VIII. of France, that is till the year 1498. And it appears by the concluſion, that it was finiſhed by the Author, November 7, 1504 (2). The ſecond volume begins with an account of the wards of London, and the pariſh-churches in each ward: and then are ſet down the bailiffs of that city under every year, from the time they were appointed, that is, from 1190, until the year 1209, when the two bailiffs were converted, by King John, into a mayor and two ſhireves. Of theſe the author gives exact liſts, under each year, as far as his Chronicle reaches. He comprehends, as 'tis ſaid in the title page, the Chronicles of England and of France; not all together, or under the reſpective years, but in diſtinct chapters, or articles, denoted in the beginning, by the words Angha and Francia.—We are told, that Cardinal Wolſey cauſed as many copies of this book as he could come at to be burnt, becauſe the author had made too clear a diſcovery of the large revenues of the clergy (3). As for the character it bears: 'tis called, by one who was a good judge (4), 'a painful labour, to the great ho-'nour of the city and the whole realm.' He is very particular in the affairs of London; many good things being noted by him (which concern the government thereof) hardly to be had elſewhere. In the beginning of his ſeventh part, he obſerves Ralph Higden's method of making his years commence at Michaelmas: and is, in other reſpects, a great follower of that author (5).

 [Fabian, according to Tanner, and the Authors whom Tanner follows, was Poëta haud infelicis Ingenii (7). He makes, however, but a poor figure in Mr. Warton's hiſtory of Engliſh poetry. "In his Chronicle," ſays this gentleman, 'or Concordance of Hiſtories, it is his uſual practice, at the diviſion of the books, to inſert metrical prologues, and other pieces in verſe. The beſt of his metres is the Complaint of King Edward the Second, who, like the perſonages in Boccacio's Fall of Princes, is very dramatically introduced, reciting his own misfortunes. But this ſoliloquy is nothing more than a tranſlation from a very ſhort and poor Latin poem, attributed to that monarch, but probably written by William of Wyrceſter, which is preſerved among the manuſcripts of the College of Arms, and entituled, "Lamentatio glorioſi Regis Edwardi de Karnarvon "quam edidit tempore ſuæ incarcerationis." Our Author's tranſitions from proſe to verſe, in the courſe of a prolix narrative, ſeem to be made with much eaſe: and, when he begins to verſify, the hiſtorian diſappears only by the addition of rhyme and ſtanza. In the firſt edition of his Chronicle, by way of epilogues to his ſeven books, he has given us The ſeven Joys of the Bleſſed Virgin, in Engliſh rime. And, under the year 1325, there is a poem to the Virgin, and another to one Badby, a Lollard under the year 1409. Theſe are ſuppreſſed in the later editions. He has likewiſe left a panegyric on the city of London; but deſpairs of doing juſtice to ſo noble a ſubject for verſe, even if he had the eloquence of Tully, the morality of Seneca, and the harmony of that faire lady Calliope.'

(7) Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica, p. 272.

Fabian was the firſt of our old Chroniclers who wrote hiſtory in Engliſh proſe; but, he attained, in this reſpect, a very ſmall degree of excellence. 'As an hiſtorian,' ſays Mr. Warton, 'our author is the dulleſt of compilers. He is equally attentive to the Mayors of London and of the Monarchs of England: and ſeems to have thought the dinners at Guildhall, and the pageantries of the city companies, more intereſting tranſactions than our victories in France and our ſtruggles for public liberty at home. One of Fabyan's hiſtorical anecdotes, under the important reign of Henry the Fifth, is, that a new weather-cock was placed on the croſs of St. Paul's ſteeple. The earlier chapters of theſe childiſh annals faithfully record all thoſe fabulous traditions, which generally ſupply the place of hiſtoric monuments in deſcribing the origin of a great nation (8).'  [FAIRFAX (EDWARD), an ingenious poet, who flouriſhed in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James the Firſt, was the ſecond ſon of Sir Thomas Fairfax, of Denton, Yorkſhire, by Dorothy his wife, daughter of George Gale, of Aſcham-Grange, Eſq. Treaſurer to the Mint at York (a) [A]. In what year he was born is not related. The family from which he ſprang was of a very military turn. His father had paſſed his youth in the wars of Europe, and was with Charles Duke of Bourbon, at the ſacking of Rome, in the year 1527. His engaging in this expedition is ſaid to have given ſuch offence to Sir William Fairfax, that he was diſinherited (b). But this is a fact to the truth of which we can by no means give our aſſent. He might incur for a time the diſpleaſure of his father; but it is certain that he ſucceeded to the family eſtate at Denton, and tranſmitted that eſtate to his deſcendants (c). It was in 1577, or, according to Douglas, in 1579, that he was knighted by Queen Elizabeth. This was when he was far advanced in years (d). The poet's eldeſt brother, Thomas, who in proceſs of time became the firſt Lord Fairfax of Cameron, received the honour of knighthood before Rouen in Normandy, in 1591, for his bravery and good behaviour in the army ſent to the aſſiſtance of Henry the Fourth of France; and he afterwards ſignalized himſelf on many occaſions in Germany againſt the Houſe of Auſtria. A younger brother of Edward Fairfax, Sir Charles, was a Captain under Sir Francis Vere, at the battle of Newport, fought in 1600; and in the famous three years ſiege of Oſtend, commanded all the Engliſh in that town, for ſome time before it ſurrendered. Here he received a wound in his face, from the piece of a ſkull of a Marſhal of France, killed near him by a cannon-ball; and ſoon after he was himſelf ſlain. This event happened in 1604 (e).

While his brothers were thus honourably employed abroad, Mr. Edward Fairfax devoted himſelf to a ſtudious courſe of life. That he had the advantages of a very liberal education cannot be doubted, from his intellectual acquirements, and the diſtinction which he ſoon obtained in the literary world. Indeed, his attainments were ſuch, that he became qualified to have filled any employment, either in Church or State. But an invincible modeſty, and the love of retirement, induced him to prefer the ſhady groves and natural caſcades of Denton, and the Foreſt of Knareſborough, to the employments and advantages of a public ſtation. Accordingly, having married, he fixed himſelf at Fuyiſtone, as a private gentleman. His time was not, however, inactively or ingloriouſly ſpent. This was apparent in his poetical exertions, and in ſeveral compoſitions in proſe, the manuſcripts of which were left by him in the library of Lord Fairfax, at Denton. The care and education of his children, for which he was ſo well qualified, probably engaged ſome part of his attention. We are informed, likewiſe, that he was very ſeviceable, in the ſame way, to his brother Lord Fairfax; beſides which, he aſſiſted him in the government of his family and the management of his affairs. The conſequence of this was, that all his Lordſhip's children were bred ſcholars, and well principled in religion and virtue; that his houſe was famed for its hoſpitality, and, at the ſame time, his eſtate improved. What Mr. Edward Fairfax's principles were, appears from the character which he gives of himſelf, in his book on Dæmonology. "For myſelf," ſays he, "I am in Religion neither a fantaſtic Puritan "nor a ſuperſtitious Papiſt; but ſo ſettled in conſcience, that I have the ſure ground "of God's word to warrant all I believe, and the commendable ordinances of our "Engliſh Church to approve all I practiſe: in which courſe I live a faithful Chriſtian, "and an obedient ſubject, and ſo teach my family." In theſe principles he perſevered to the end of his days, which took place about the year 1632. He died at his own houſe, called Newhall, in the pariſh of Fuyiſtone, between Denton and Knareſborough, and was buried in the ſame pariſh. A marble ſtone, with an inſcription, was placed over his grave; but he deſerved a monument near Godfrey of Boulogne, in the Temple of Jeruſalem (f).

Such are the few particulars that are related concerning the private life of Mr. Edward Fairfax. But it is as a poet that he is principally entitled to attention; for, in this reſpect, he is held in juſt reputation, and deſerves to have his name tranſmitted with honour to poſterity. His prime work was his tranſlation of Torquato Taſſo's heroic poem of "Godfrey of Bologne" out of Italian into ſmooth and excellent Engliſh verſe. What adds to the merit of the work is, that it was his firſt eſſay in poetry, and executed when he was very young. On its appearance it was dedicated to Queen Elizabeth. The book was highly commended by the beſt judges and wits of the age in which it was written, and their judgment has been ſanctioned by the approbation of ſucceeding critics. King James valued it above all other Engliſh poetry; and King Charles uſed to divert himſelf with reading it in the time of his confinement (g). All who mention Fairfax, ſays the writer of Cibber's Lives of the Poets, do him the juſtice to allow that he was an accompliſhed genius; but then, it is in a way ſo cool and indifferent, as ſhews that they had never read his works, or were any way charmed with the melody of his verſes. It was impoſſible that Dryden could be ſo blind to his beauties. Accordingly, we find him introducing Spenſer and Fairfax almoſt on the level, as the leading authors of their times; nay, tacitly yielding the palm in point of harmony to the laſt; by aſſerting that Waller confeſſed that he owed the muſic of his numbers to Fairfax's Godfrey of Bologne. "The truth is, this gentle-"man is, perhaps, the only writer down to Sir William Davenant, who needs no "apology to be made for him on account of the age in which he lived. His diction "is ſo pure, elegant, and full of graces, and the turn of his lines ſo perfectly melo-"dious, that one cannot read it without rapture; and we can ſcarcely imagine the "original Italian has greatly the advantage in either: nor is it very probable that, "while Fairfax can be read, any author will attempt a new tranſlation of Taſſo with "ſucceſs (h)." Without diſputing the general truth of this eulogium, (which, however, might ſomewhat have been ſoftened,) it cannot fail to be obſerved, how much the Biographer has been miſtaken in his concluding conjecture. A new tranſlation of Taſſo has not only been attempted, but executed, by Mr. Hoole, with remarkable ſucceſs and with diſtinguiſhed excellence; and indeed in ſuch a manner, that, in the opinion of Dr. Johnſon, Fairfax's work will perhaps not ſoon be reprinted (i). Of Fairfax a periodical critic thus ſpeaks: "He had the powers of genius and fancy, and "broke through that ſervile cuſtom of tranſlation which prevailed in his time. His "liberal elegance rendered his verſions more agreeable than the dryneſs of Johnſon, and "the dull fidelity of Sandys and May; and he would have tranſlated Taſſo with ſucceſs, "had he not unhappily choſen a ſpecies of verſification which was ill adapted to the "Engliſh language (k)." Mr. Hoole, in aſſigning the reaſons for his giving a new verſion of Taſſo's "Jeruſalem delivered," has expreſſed himſelf as follows: "I may "be told, indeed, that there is an Engliſh tranſlation of him already, and therefore "that an apology is neceſſary for a new one. To this I anſwer, that the only com-"plete tranſlation is that of Fairfax, which is in ſtanzas that cannot be read with "pleaſure by the generality of thoſe who have a taſte for Engliſh poetry: of which no "other proof is neceſſary than that it appears ſcarcely to have been read at all. It is "not only unpleaſant, but irkſome, in ſuch a degree as to ſurmount curioſity, and "more than counterbalance all the beauty of expreſſion and ſentiment, which is to

" Engliſh poetry, except of the very few who have acquired a taſte for the phraſes and

" ments (l)." It was not neceſſary to the juſtification of Mr. Hoole's new verſion, that he ſhould paſs ſo ſevere a cenſure on Fairfax's meaſure. To ſay that " it is not only
" unpleaſant, but irkſome, in ſuch a degree as to ſurmount curioſity, and more " than counterbalance all the beauty of expreſſion which is to be found in the " work," appears to us to be very unjuſt. The writer of the preſent article, though ſenſible of Mr. Hoole's ſuperiority, has lately read the whole of Fairfax, not merely without diſguſt, but with pleaſure. The perſpicuity and harmony of his verſification are indeed extraordinary, conſidering the time in which he wrote; and in this reſpect he ranks nearly with Spenſer. Nothing but a fine fancy and an elegant mind could have enabled him, in that period, to have made ſuch advances towards perfection.

(l) Hoole's "Jeruſalem delivered," Vol. I. preface, p. xviii, xix.

Since theſe remarks were written, we have had the pleaſure of finding that Mr. Hume's ſentiments are not very different from our own. " Fairfax," ſays that hiſtorian,
" has tranſlated Taſſo with an elegance and eaſe, and at the ſame time with an exact-
" neſs, which for that age are ſurprizing. Each line in the original is faithfully ren" dered by a correſpondent line in the tranſlation. Harrington's tranſlation of Arioſto
" is not likewiſe without its merit. It is to be regretted, that theſe poets ſhould have " imitated the Italians in their ſtanza, which has a prolixity and uniformity in it that " diſpleaſes in long performances. They had otherwiſe, as well as Spenſer, contri" buted much to the poliſhing and refining of Engliſh verſification (*)." Many, if not moſt of our readers have ſeen a ſpecimen of Fairfax's meaſure at the end of Dr. Johnſon's life of Waller. Another ſhall be given below [B].

Mr.

[B] Another ſhall be given below.] It is from the twelfth book, where Arſetes, an Eunuch, relates to Clorinda the hiſtory of her birth.

18

Clorinda there her ſilver arms off rent,
Her helm, her ſhield, her hawberk ſhining bright,
An armour black as jet or coal ſhe hent,
Wherein withouten plume her ſelf ſhe dight;
For thus diſguis'd amid her foes ſhe ment
To paſs unſeen, by help of friendly night,
To whom her eunuch, old Arſetes, came,
That from her cradle nurſt and kept the dame.

This aged ſire had follow'd far and near,
(Through land and ſeas) the ſtrong and hardy maid,
He ſaw her leave her arms and wonted gear,
Her danger nigh that ſudden change foreſaid:
By his white locks from black that changed were,
In following her, the woful man her praid,
By all his ſervice and his taken pain,
To leave that fond attempt, but pray'd in vain.

20

At laſt (quoth he) ſince hardned to thine ill,
Thy cruel heart is to thy loſs prepar'd,
That my weak age, nor tears that down diſtil,
Nor humble ſuit, nor plaint, thou liſt regard;
Attend a while, ſtrange things unfold I will,
Hear both thy birth and high eſtate declar'd;
Follow my counſel, or thy will, that done,
She ſit to hear, the eunuch thus begun.

Senapus rul'd, and yet perchance doth raign
In mighty Ethiope, and her deſarts waſte,
The Lore of Chriſt both he and all his train
Of people black, hath kept and long embrac'd,
To him a Pagan was I ſold for gain,
And with his Queen (as her chief eunuch) plac'd;
Black was this Queen as jet, yet on her eyes
Sweet lovelineſs (in black attired) lies.

The fire of love and froſt of jealouſie,
Her huſband's troubled ſoul alike torment,
The tyde of fond ſuſpicion flowed high,
The foe to love and plague to ſweet content,
He mew'd her up from ſight of mortal eye,
Nor day he would his beams on her had bent:
She (wiſe and lowly) by her huſband's pleaſure,
Her joy, her peace, her will, her wiſh did meaſure.

Her priſon was a chamber, painted round
With goodly pourtraits and with ſtories old,
As white as ſnow there ſtood a virgin bound,
Beſides a dragon fierce, a champion bold
The monſter did with poinant ſpear through wound,
The gored beaſt lay dead upon the mold;
The gentle Queen before this image laid,
She plain'd, ſhe mourn'd, ſhe wept, ſhe ſigh'd, ſhe praid:

24

At laſt with child ſhe prov'd, and forth ſhe brought (And thou art ſhe) a daughter fair and bright,
In her thy colour white new terrour wrought,
She wondred on thy face with ſtrange affright,
But yet ſhe purpos'd in her fearful thought
To hide thee from the King thy father's ſight, Leſt thy bright hew ſhould his ſuſpect approve,
For ſeld a crow begets a ſilver dove.

And to her ſpouſe to ſhew ſhe was diſpos'd
A Negro's babe late born, in room of thee,
And for the tower wherein ſhe lay inclos'd,
Was with her damſels only wond and mee,
To me, on whoſe true faith ſhe moſt repos'd,
She gave thee, ere thou couldeſt chriſtned be,
Nor could I ſince find means thee to baptize,
In Pagan lands thou know'ſt its not the guiſe.

Mr. Fairfax's poetical exertions did not end with his tranſlation of Taſſo. He wrote the hiſtory of Edward the Black Prince, and a number of eclogues. No part of the hiſtory of Edward the Black Prince has, we believe, ever been laid before the public; which is the rather to be regretted as it might hence have more diſtinctly been diſcerned what were our poet's powers of original invention. The eclogues were compoſed in the firſt year of the reign of King James, and, after their being finiſhed, lay

26

To me ſhe gave thee, and ſhe wept withall,
To foſter thee in ſome far diſtant place,
Who can her griefs and plaints to reck'ning call,
How oft ſhe ſwouned at the laſt embrace:
Her ſtreaming tears amid her kiſſes fall,
Her ſighs, her dire complaints did enterlace?
And looking up at laſt, O God (quoth ſhee)
Who do'ſt my heart and inward mourning ſee,

27

If mind and body ſpotleſs to this day,
If I have kept my bed ſtill undefilde,
(Not for my ſelf a ſinful wretch I pray,
That in thy preſence am an abject vilde)
Preſerve this babe, whoſe mother muſt denay
To nouriſh it, preſerve this harmleſs child,
Oh let it live, and chaſte like me it make,
But for good fortune elſewhere ſample take.

28

Thou heav'nly ſouldier which deliv'red haſt
That ſacred virgin from the ſerpent old,
If on thine altars I have offerings plac'd,
And ſacrific'd myrrh, frankincenſe and gold,
On this poor child thy heav'nly looks down caſt,
With gracious eye this ſilly babe behold;
This ſaid, her ſtrength and living ſprite was fled,
She ſigh'd, ſhe groan'd, ſhe ſwouned in her bed.

29

Weeping I took thee, in a little cheſt,
Cov'red with herbs and leaves, I brought thee out
So ſecretly, that none of all the reſt
Of ſuch an act ſuſpicion had or doubt,
To wilderneſs my ſteps I firſt addreſt,
Where horrid ſhades enclos'd me round about,
A tygreſs there I met, in whoſe fierce eyes
Fury and wrath, rage, death, and terrour lies:

30

Up to a tree I leapt, and on the graſs,
(Such was my ſudden fear) I left thee lying,
To thee the beaſt with furious courſe did paſs,
With curious looks upon thy viſage prying,
All ſuddenly both meek and mild ſhe was,
With friendly cheer thy tender body eying:
At laſt ſhe lick'd thee, and with geſture milde
About thee play'd, and thou upon her ſmilde.

31

Her fearful muzzle full of dreadful threat,
In thy weak hand thou took'ſt withouten dreed,
The gentle beaſt with milk out-ſtretched teat;
(As nurſes cuſtom) proffer'd thee to feed,
As one that wondereth on ſome marvel great,
I ſtood this while amazed at the deed,
When thee ſhe ſaw well fill'd and ſatisfied,
Unto the woods again the tygreſs hied.

32

She gone, down from the tree I came in haſt,
And took thee up, and on my journey wend,
Within a little thorp I ſtaid at laſt,
And to a nurſe the charge of thee commend,
And ſporting with thee there long time I paſt,
Till term of ſixteen months were brought to end,
And thou begun (as little children do)
With half clipt words to prattle, and to go.

33

But having paſt the Auguſt of mine age,
When more than half my tap of life was run,
Rich by rewards given by your mother ſage,
For merits paſt, and ſervice yet undone,
I long'd to leave this wandring pilgrimage,
And in my native ſoil again to won,
To get ſome ſeely home I had deſire,
Loth ſtill to warm me at anothers fire.

34

To Egypt-ward (where I was born) I went,
And bore thee with me, by a rolling flood,
Till I with ſavage thieves well nigh was hent;
Before, the brook, the thieves behind me ſtood:
Thee to forſake I never could conſent,
And gladly would I 'ſcape thoſe outlaws wood,
Into the flood I leapt far from the brim,
My left hand bore thee, with the right I ſwim.

35

Swift was the currant, in the middle ſtream
A whirpool gaped with devouring jaws,
The gulph (on ſuch miſhap ere I could dream)
Into his deep abyſs my carkaſs draws,
There I forſook thee, the wild waters ſeem
To pity thee, a gentle wind there blows,
Whoſe friendly puffs ſafe to the ſhore thee drive,
Where wet and weary I at laſt arrive:

36

I took thee up, and in my dream that night,
(When buried was the world in ſleep and ſhade)
I ſaw a champion clad in armour bright,
That o're my head ſhaked a flaming blade,
He ſaid, I charge thee execute aright,
That charge this infant's mother on thee laid,
Baptize the child, high Heav'n eſteems her dear,
And I her keeper will attend her near;

37

I will her keep, defend, ſave and protect,
I made the waters milde, the tygreſs tame,
O wretch that heav'nly warnings do'ſt reject!
The warriour vaniſht having ſaid the ſame.
I roſe and journey'd on my way direct,
When bluſhing morn from Tithon's bed forth came,
But for my faith is true and ſure I ween,
And dreams are falſe, you ſtill unchriſtened been.

38

A Pagan therefore thee I foſtred have,
Nor of thy birth the truth did ever tell,
Since you encreaſed are in courage brave,
Your ſex and natures ſelf you both excel,
Full many a realm have you made bond and ſlave,
Your Fortunes laſt your ſelf remember well,
And how in peace and war, in joy and teen,
I have your ſervant, and your tutor been.

39

Laſt morn, from ſkies ere ſtars exiled were,
In deep and deathlike ſleep my ſenſes dround,
The ſelf-ſame viſion did again appear,
With ſtormy wrathful looks, and thundering ſound,
Villain (quoth he) within ſhort while thy dear
Muſt change her life, and leave this ſinful ground,
Thine be the loſs, the torment, and the care,
This ſaid, he fled through ſkies, through clouds and aire.

lay neglected ten years in the author's ſtudy, until Lodowic, Duke of Richmond and Lenox, deſired a ſight of them, which occaſioned Mr. Fairfax to tranſcribe them for his Grace's uſe. That copy was ſeen and approved by many learned men; and Dr. Field, afterwards Biſhop of Hereford, wrote verſes upon it. The following lines were addreſſed to our poet by Wilſon, Scoto-Britannus:

" Et Phœbum, caſtaſque doces, Fairfaxe, Sorores
" Salſa verecundo verba lepore loqui;
" Ulla nec in toto prurit laſcivia libro,
" Pagina non minus eſt quam tibi vita proba.

" Chaſte is thy muſe as is a veſtal nun,
" And thy Apollo ſpotleſs as the ſun;
" No wanton thought betray'd by word or look,
" As blameleſs is thy life as is thy book."

But the book itſelf, and Dr. Field's encomium, periſhed in the fire, when the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall was burnt, and with it part of the Duke of Richmond's lodgings. Mr. William Fairfax, however, our author's ſon, recovered the eclogues out of his father's looſe papers (m). Theſe eclogues were twelve in number, and were compoſed on important ſubjects, relating to the manners, characters, and incidents of the times. They were pointed with many fine ſtrokes of ſatire; dignified with wholeſome leſſons of morality and policy to thoſe of the higheſt rank; and ſome modeſt hints were given even to Majeſty itſelf. With reſpect to poetry, they were entitled to high commendation; and the learning they contained was ſo various and extenſive, that, according to the evidence of his ſon, who wrote large annotations on each, no man's reading beſide the author's own was ſufficient to explain his references effectually. The fourth eclogue was printed, by Mrs. Cooper, in "The Muſes Library," publiſhed in 1737. It is ſomewhat extraordinary that the whole of them ſhould never have appeared in print. If they are ſtill in being, it might not, perhaps, be an unacceptable ſervice to give them to the public (n).

(n) Ibid. p. 269.

None of Fairfax's writings in proſe have ever been publiſhed. They moſt of them related to the controverſy of Religion with the Church of Rome, and are repreſented as having afforded ſignal proofs of his learning and judgment. The perſon with whom the controverſy was carried on was one John Dorrell, a Romiſh Prieſt of no ordinary fame, at that time a priſoner in the Caſtle of York. Between him and Mr. Fairfax a variety of letters paſſed, relative to the moſt diſtinguiſhed tenets of popery. A copy of our author's Treatiſe on Dæmonology is in the poſſeſſion of Iſaac Reed, Eſq. It is entituled, " A Diſcourſe of Witchcraft, as it was acted in the Family of Mr. Edward " Fairfax, of Fuyiſtone, in the county of York, in the year 1621." Fairfax left ſeveral children, ſons and daughters. William, his eldeſt ſon, before mentioned, was a ſcholar, and of the ſame temper with his father, but more cynical. He tranſlated Diogenes Laertius out of Greek into Engliſh (o). This gentleman was grammatical tutor to Mr. Stanley, the celebrated author of the Hiſtory of Philoſophy (p). It is aſſerted by Mrs. Cooper, that the greateſt part of that work, as well as the notes on Euripides, truly belonged to Mr. William Fairfax, though his modeſty and friendſhip declined the reputation of them (q). To ſuch vague aſſertions little regard, we apprehend, is to be paid. It was not Euripides, but Æſchylus, that was publiſhed by Mr. Stanley.]

Hear then my joy, my hope, my darling, hear,
High Heav'n ſome dire misfortune threatned hath,
Diſpleaſed pardie, becauſe I did thee lear
A lore, repugnant to thy parents faith;
Ah, for my ſake, this bold attempt forbear;
Put off theſe ſable arms, appeaſe thy wrath.
This ſaid, he wept, ſhe penſive ſtood and ſad, Becauſe like dream her ſelf but lately had.

With cheerful ſmile ſhe anſwer'd him at laſt,
I will this faith obſerve, it ſeems me true,
Which from my cradle age thou taught me haſt;
I will not change it for religion new,
Nor with vain ſhews of fear and dread agaſt,
This enterprize forbear I to purſue,
No, not if death in his moſt dreadful face
Wherewith he ſcareth mankind, kept the place (1).

FAIRFAX (THOMAS, Lord), a very active man in the Parliament's ſervice during our unhappy civil wars in the laſt century, and at length General of their armies, was the eldeſt ſon of Ferdinando Lord Fairfax [A], by Mary his wife, daughter of Edmund Sheffield Earl of Mulgrave. He was born at Denton within the pariſh of Otley, in Yorkſhire, in January, 1611 (a). After a proper ſchool education, he ſtudied ſome time in St. John's College, in Cambridge, to which, in his latter days, he became a benefactor. He appears to have been a lover of learning, though he did not excel in any branch, except it was in the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Britain, as will appear in the ſequel. Being of a martial diſpoſition even in his younger years, but finding no employment at home, he went and ſerved in Holland as a volunteer under the command of Horatio Lord Vere [B], in order to learn the art of war (b). After ſome ſtay there (but how long we cannot learn) he came back to England; and, retiring to his father's houſe, married to Anne, fourth daughter of the ſaid Lord Vere. Here he contracted a ſtrong averſion for the Court; either by the inſtigation of his wife, who was a zealous Preſbyterian (c), or elſe by the perſuaſions and example of his father, who grew 'actively and factiouſly diſaffected to the King (d).' So that, upon his Majeſty's firſt endeavours to raiſe a guard at York for his own perſon; [apprehended then by the people of thoſe parts, and found quickly after, to be the beginning of an army;] he was entruſted by his party to prefer a petition to the King, beſeeching him to hearken to his Parliament, and not to take that courſe of raiſing forces; which petition the King endeavouring to ſhun, he preſſed with that inſtance, and followed him ſo with it, on Heyworth-moor, in the preſence of near 100,000 people, that at laſt he preſented it upon the pommel of his ſaddle (e). Shortly after, upon the actual breaking out of the civil wars, in 1642, his father having received a commiſſion from the Parliament to be General of the forces in the North, he had a commiſſion under him to be General of the Horſe (f). His firſt exploit was at Bradford in Yorkſhire, which he obliged a body of Royaliſts to quit, and to retire to Leeds. A few days after, he and Capt. Hotham, with ſome horſe and dragoons marching thither, the Royaliſts fled in haſte to York. And the former having advanced to Tadcaſter, reſolved to keep the paſs at Wetherby, for ſecuring the Weſt Riding of Yorkſhire, whence their chief ſupplies came. Sir Thomas Glemham attempted to diſlodge them thence; but, after a ſhort and ſharp encounter, retired (g). Whereupon William Cavendiſh Earl of Newcaſtle, and Henry Clifford Earl of Cumberland, united their forces at York, amounting to 9000 men (h), and reſolved to fall upon Tadcaſter: which being judged untenable, the Lord Fairfax, and his ſon Sir Thomas, drew out to an advantageous piece of ground near the town: but, after a ſix hours fight, were beaten, and withdrew in the night to Selby (i). Three days after, Sir Thomas marched in the night by ſeveral towns in which the Royaliſts lay, and came to Bradford, where he entrenched himſelf. But having too many ſoldiers to lie idle, and too few to be upon conſtant duty [C], he reſolved to attempt his enemies in their garriſons. Accordingly, coming before Leeds, he carried that town (Jan. 23, 1642-3) after a hot diſpute, wherein a good ſtore of ammunition fell into his hands, of which he ſtood in great want (k). Next

[A] Was the eldeſt ſon of Ferdinando Lord Fairfax.] The Heralds, according to their uſual flattering ſtrain, trace up this family's pedigree even higher than the Norman Conqueſt; telling us, that it was at that time ſeated at Touceſter in Northumberland, whence they removed into Yorkſhire (*). But it is a great queſtion, whether ſurnames were thus early taken from perſons complexions; as this of Fairfax, ſignifying fair locks, from fair, and the Saxon feax, hair: and the family ſeems to have had no notion of this derivation, when they took for their motto this rebus or pun, viz. the Latin words Fare fac, ſay, do —But to return; Sir William Fairfax was High Sheriff of Yorkſhire in the 26th and 31ſt of King Henry VIII. and Thomas, his grandſon, was advanced by King Charles I. May 4. 1627. to the title of Baron Cameron in Scotland (1). This Thomas Lord Fairfax married Helen, daughter to Robert Aſk, Eſq. and by her left five ſons and two daughters. Ferdinando, the eldeſt, was entirely attached to the Parliament (2); one of their committee for the country of York (3); and General of their forces in Yorkſhire, and the adjacent counties (4). He ſerved them with the utmoſt zeal, upon every occaſion, till his death, which happened at York, March 13, 1647-8 (5). By his wife, Mary, daughter of Edmund Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, as above related, he had three ſons; Sir Thomas, who is the ſubject of this article; Charles, ſlain at the battle of Marſton-moor, July 3, 1644; and another, not mentioned by name. Alſo ſix daughters (6). This family, as Mr. Whitelock informs us (7), was deſcended from the law.

[B] Under the command of Horatio Lord Vere.] This Horatio, was fourth ſon of John de Vere, the fifteenth Earl of Oxford, of that noble family: and, by King Charles I. ann. 1625, was advanced to the title of Lord Vere of Tilbury (8). He long ſerved in Holland, with great valour and reputation, jointly with his brother the brave Sir Francis Vere, Governor of the Briel. In 1620, Sir Horatio commanded the regiment ſent from England to the aſſiſtance of the Elector Palatine (9): and, afterwards, was employed in ſeveral other expeditions in the Netherlands. About the year 1632, or 1633, Sir Thomas Fairfax ſerved as a volunteer under him; and was at the conſiderable action of taking Boſch, or Bois-le-Duc, from the Spaniards, but had no command while he was there. He returned to England in 1634, or 1635 (10).

[C] And too few to be upon conſtant duty.] According to his own account, he had but three troops of horſe, and about eight hundred foot; but, upon ſummoning the country, he made up the latter twelve or thirteen hundred (11). Whilſt he lay at Selby, he went and beat up a quarter of the Royaliſts at Sherburne, and took Major-general Windham, and others, priſoners; but, in this attempt, his horſe was ſhot under him (12).

he defeated a party of 700 horſe and foot at Giſborough, under the command of Col. Slingſby (l). And then Wakefield and Doncaſter yielded themſelves to the Parliament. But, for theſe overt acts, William Earl of Newcaſtle, the King's General, proclaimed Sir Thomas and his father traitors, and the Parliament did the like for the Earl (m). In the mean time, the Lord Fairfax, being denied ſuccour from Hull and the Eaſt Riding, was forced to forſake Selby, and retire to Leeds: of which the Earl of Newcaſtle having intelligence, he lay with his army on Clifford-moor, to intercept him in his way to Leeds. Whereupon Sir Thomas was ordered, by his father, to bring what men he could to join with him at Sherburne, on purpoſe to ſecure his retreat. To amuſe the Earl, Sir Thomas made a diverſion at Tadcaſter, which the garriſon immediately quitted, and whereof he ſlighted the works. But the Lord Goring marching to its relief, with twenty troops of horſe and dragoons, defeated Sir Thomas upon Bramham-moor: who alſo received a ſecond defeat upon Seacroft-moor, where ſome of his men were ſlain, and many taken priſoners. So that he made his retreat with much difficulty to Leeds, about an hour after his father was ſafely come thither. And, according to him, this was one of the greateſt loſſes he ever received (n). Leeds and Bradford being all the garriſons the Parliament had in the North, Sir Thomas thought it neceſſary to poſſeſs ſome other place: therefore with about 1100 horſe and foot, he drove, on the 21ſt of May, the Royaliſts out of Wakefield, which they had ſeized again; and took 1400 priſoners, 80 officers, and great ſtore of ammunition (o). But, ſhortly after, the Earl of Newcaſtle coming to beſiege Bradford, and Sir Thomas and his father having the boldneſs, with about 3000 men, to go and attack his whole army, which conſiſted of 10,000, on Adderton-moor; they were entirely routed by the Earl, on the 30th of June (p), with a conſiderable loſs [D]. Upon that, Halifax and Beverly being abandoned by the Parliamentarians, and the Lord Fairfax having neither a place of ſtrength do defend himſelf in, nor a garriſon in Yorkſhire to retire to [E], withdrew the ſame night to Leeds, to ſecure that town. But, by his order, Sir Thomas ſtayed in Bradford with 800 foot, and 60 horſe; wherein being ſurrounded, he was obliged to force his way through: in which deſperate attempt, his lady, and many others, were taken priſoners [F]. At his coming to Leeds, he found things in great diſtraction; the Council of War having reſolved to quit the town, and retreat to Hull, which was ſixty miles off; with many of the King's garriſons in the way. However, though there were fifty or ſixty troops of Royaliſts within three miles of Leeds, he got ſafely to Selby, where there was a ferry, and hard by one of the Parliament's garriſons at Cawood (q). Immediately after his coming to Selby, being attacked by a party of horſe which purſued him, he received a ſhot in the wriſt of his left arm, which made the bridle fall out of his hand; and being among the nerves and veins, ſuddenly let out ſuch a quantity of blood, that he was ready to fall from his horſe. But, taking the reins in the other hand in which he had his ſword, he withdrew himſelf out of the crowd [G]; and after Whilſt the Lord Fairfax was muſing on theſe ſad thoughts, a meſſenger was ſent unto him, from Hull, to let him know the townſmen had ſecured the Governor; that they were ſenſible of the danger he was in, and, if he had any occaſion to make uſe of that place, he ſhould be very readily and gladly received there (14).

[F] In which deſperate attempt, his lady, and many others, were taken priſoners.] As we learn from his own memorials, in the following words:—'I muſt 'not here forget my wife, who ran the ſame hazard 'with us in this retreat, and with as little expreſſion 'of fear; not from any zeal, or delight, in the war, 'but through a willing and patient ſuffering of this 'undeſirable condition. I ſent two or three horſe-'men before, to diſcover what they could of the ene-'my, who preſently returned, and told us there was 'a guard of horſe cloſe by us.———I, with ſome '12 more, charged them. Sir Henry Fowles, Major-'General Gefford, myſelf, and three more, brake 'through. Capt. Mudd was ſlain, and the reſt of our 'horſe being cloſe by, the enemy fell upon them, and 'ſoon routed them, taking moſt of them priſoners, 'among whom was my wife, the Officer, Will. Hill, 'behind whom ſhe rid, being taken. I ſaw this diſ-'after, but could give no relief; for, after I was got 'through, I was in the enemies rear alone; thoſe, who 'had charged through with me, went on to Leeds, 'thinking I had done ſo too: but I was unwilling to 'leave my company, and ſtayed till I ſaw there was 'no more in my power to do, but to be taken pri-'ſoner with them. I then retired to Leeds (15).'

(15) Memorials, &c. as above, p. 49, 50.

[G] He withdrew himſelf out of the crowd.] Theſe additional circumſtances, from his own account, may not be unacceptable to the reader. '———The ene-'my minding nothing ſo much as how to get away, 'I drew myſelf out of the crowd, and came to our 'men, who turned about, and ſeeing me ready to 'fall from my horſe, they laid me on the ground: 'now, when I was almoſt ſenſeleſs, my ſurgeon came 'ſeaſonably, and bound up the wound, and ſtopt the 'bleeding. After a quarter of an hour's reſt, I got 'a horſeback again; the other part of our horſe had 'beaten the enemy back to Cawood, the ſame way 'they came firſt to us. Thus, by the goodneſs of 'God, our paſſage was made clear; ſome went over 'the ferry after my father; I myſelf, with others, went 'through the levels to Hull.———I had been twenty 'hours on horſeback, after I was ſhot, without any 'reſt or refreſhment, and as many hours before. And 'as a farther affliction, my daughter [afterwards 'Ducheſs of Buckingham] not above five years old, 'being carried before her maid, endured all this re-'treat a horſeback; but, nature not being able to hold 'out any longer, ſhe fell into frequent ſwoonings, and 'in appearance was ready to expire her laſt. Having 'now paſſed the Trent, and ſeeing a houſe not far 'off, I ſent her, with her maid only, thither, with 'little hopes of ſeeing her any more alive, though I 'intended the next day to ſend a ſhip from Hull for 'her.

after a very troubleſome and dangerous paſſage (being often attacked, ſometimes in the front, ſometimes in the rear), he came to Hull (r). Upon theſe repeated diſaſters, the Scots were haſtily ſolicited to ſend 20,000 men to the aſſiſtance of the Parliamentarians, who were thus likely to be overpowered. The Lord Fairfax, after his coming to Hull, made it his firſt buſineſs to raiſe new forces, and, in a ſhort time, had about 1500 foot, and 700 horſe. The town being little, Sir Thomas was ſent to Beverly, with the horſe and 600 foot: for, the Marquis of Newcaſtle (s) looking upon them as inconſiderable, and leaving only a few garriſons, was marched with his whole army into Lincolnſhire; having orders to go into Eſſex, and block up London on that ſide. But he was haſtily recalled Northward, upon the Lord Fairfax's ſending out a large party to make an attempt upon Stanford-bridge near York. The Marquis, at his return into Yorkſhire, firſt diſlodged, from Beverly, Sir Thomas, who retreated into Hull, to which the Marquis laid ſiege; but could not carry the place. During the ſiege, the horſe being uſeleſs, and many dying every day, Sir Thomas was ſent with them over into Lincolnſhire, to join the Earl of Mancheſter's forces, then commanded by Major-General Cromwell (t). At Horncaſtle, or Winſby, they routed a party of 5000 men, commanded by Sir John Henderſon: and, at the ſame time, the beſieged in Hull making a ſally upon the beſiegers, obliged them to retire. Theſe two defeats together, the one falling heavy upon the horſe, the other upon the foot, kept the Royaliſts all that winter from attempting any thing; and the Parliamentarians, after the taking of Lincoln, ſettled themſelves in winter quarters (u). But Sir Thomas had not long the benefit of them; for, in the coldeſt ſeaſon of the year, he was commanded by the Parliament to go and raiſe the ſiege of Nantwich in Cheſhire, which the Lord Byron, with an army from Ireland, had reduced to great extremity. He ſet forward from Lincolnſhire, December 29, and, being joined by Sir William Brereton, entirely routed, on the 21ſt of January, the Lord Byron, who was drawn out to meet them (w) [H]. After that, they took in ſeveral garriſons in Cheſhire, particularly Crew-houſe, &c. (x). Sir Thomas, having ſtayed in thoſe parts till the middle of March, was ordered back by his father into Yorkſhire, that by the conjunction of their forces he might be abler to take the field. They met about Ferry-bridge; and Col. Bellaſis, Governor of York, having advanced to Selby to hinder their junction, they found means, notwithſtanding, to join, and entirely defeated him, on the 11th of April, 1644 (y) [I]. This good ſucceſs rendered Sir Thomas maſter of the field in Yorkſhire, and nothing then hindered him from marching into Northumberland, as he had been ordered by the Parliament to join the Scots, which were kept from advancing Southward by the ſuperior forces of the Marquis of Newcaſtle, quartered at Durham. But that ſtroke having thrown York into the utmoſt diſtraction, the inhabitants ſpeedily ſent to the Marquis to haſte back thither; by which means a way was left open for the Scots, who, with cold, and frequent alarms, were reduced to great extremity. They joined the Lord Fairfax at Wetherby, on the 20th of April, and, marching on to York, laid ſiege to that city [K], wherein

'her. I went on to Barton, having ſent before to 'have a ſhip ready againſt my coming thither. Here 'I lay down to take a little reſt, if it were poſſible 'to find any in a body ſo full of pain, and a mind 'yet fuller of anxiety and trouble. Though I muſt 'acknowledge it as the infinite goodneſs of God, that 'my ſpirit was nothing at all diſcouraged from doing 'ſtill that which I thought to be my duty. I had 'not reſted a quarter of an hour, before the enemy 'came cloſe to the town. I had now not above a 'hundred horſe with me: we went to the ſhip, where 'under the ſecurity of her ordnance we got all our 'men and horſe aboard; and, croſſing Humber, we 'arrived at Hull, our men faint and tired. I myſelf 'had loſt all, even to my ſhirt; for, my cloaths were 'made unfit to wear with rents and blood. Preſently 'after my coming to Hull, I ſent a ſhip for my daughter, who was brought the next day to the town, 'pretty well recovered of her long and tedious journey. Not many days after, the Earl of Newcaſtle 'ſent my wife back again in his coach, with ſome 'horſe to guard her; which generous act of his gained 'him more reputation than he could have got by 'detaining a lady priſoner upon ſuch terms (16).'

Col. George Monk, then in the King's ſervice, being taken in this action, was ſent up priſoner to the Tower of London, where he remained till 1647, when he entered into the Parliament's ſervice, for the reduction of Ireland. [I] They found means, notwithſtanding, to join, and entirely defeated him, &c.] The Lord Fairfax took a great compaſs about, to deceive the vigilance of the Royaliſts, and by that means joined his ſon (18). Their attack was in three diviſions; the firſt led on by the Lord Fairfax himſelf; the next by Sir John Meldrum; and the third by Col. Bright, brother-in-law to Col. Lambert: Sir Thomas Fairfax led on the horſe. The matter was a long time diſputed with equality on both ſides, till the horſe forced a paſſage into the town, where the following priſoners were taken; 2 Colonels, 3 Lieutenant-Colonels, 1 Major of horſe, and 3 of foot; 8 Captains of horſe, 11 Captains of foot, 3 Captain-Lieutenants, 3 Lieutenants of horſe, 23 Lieutenants of foot, 12 Enſigns, 6 Cornets of horſe, 4 Quarter-maſters; above 60 Serjeants, Trumpets, &c. 1600 common Soldiers; 2000 arms, and above; and all the bag and baggage (19).

[K] Laid ſiege to that city.] During the ſiege, St. Mary's Tower, wherein many foundation-charters and other grants relating to the Monaſteries, in Yorkſhire, and other Northern counties were depoſited, being accidentally blown up; Sir Thomas recovered as many of theſe valuable pieces as he could, rewarding very generouſly ſuch ſoldiers as brought any of them to him. He had before employed Roger Dodſworth, to copy out great numbers of them, allowing him an annuity of 40*l. per annum* during his life; by which means they were preſerved from irrecoverable ruin, and make a very conſiderable part of the Monaſticon Angli- wherein the Marquis of Newcaſtle had ſhut himſelf up (z), being cloſely purſued, on the way thither, by Sir Thomas, and Major-General Deſley (a). And, when Prince Rupert was advancing out of Lancaſhire to the relief of that place, they marched with 6000 horſe and dragoons, and 5000 foot, to ſtop his progreſs (b): but he, eluding their vigilance, and fetching a compaſs about with his army, which conſiſted of above 20,000 men, got into York (c). Whereupon the Parliamentarians raiſed the ſiege, and retired to Heſſey-moor. The Engliſh were for fighting, and the Scots for retreating; which laſt opinion prevailing, they both marched away to Tadcaſter (d), there being great differences and jealouſies between the two nations. But the raſh and haughty Prince, inſtead of haraſſing and wearing them out by prudent delays, reſolved, without conſulting the Marquis of Newcaſtle, or any of his officers, to engage them, on Marſton-moor eight miles from York, on the 2d of July: where that bloody battle was fought which entirely ruined the King's affairs in the North (e). In this battle, Sir Thomas Fairfax commanded the right wing of the horſe [L]. The Prince, after his defeat, retiring towards Lancaſhire, and the Marquis, in diſcontent, ſailing away to Hamburgh (f), the three Parliaments-General came and ſat down again before York, which ſurrendered the 15th of July: and the North was now wholly reduced by the Parliament's forces, except ſome garriſons (g). In September following, Sir Thomas was ſent to take Helmeſley-caſtle, where he received a dangerous ſhot in one of his ſhoulders, and was brought back to York, all being doubtful of his recovery for ſome time (h). Some time after, he was near being killed by a cannon-ſhot before Pomfret-caſtle [M].

Hitherto he had acquitted himſelf with undaunted bravery, and with great and deſerved applauſe from his party. Had he ſtopped here, or at ſuch times at leaſt as the King's conceſſions were in reaſon and equity a juſt ground for peace (which was more than once), he might have been honourably ranked amongſt the reſt of thoſe Patriots, who took up arms only for the redreſs of grievances. But his boundleſs ambition, and his great deſire to rule, made him weakly engage, with the utmoſt zeal, in the worſt and moſt exceptionable parts of our unhappy Civil Wars. For, when the Parliamentarians thought fit to new-model their army, and to lay aſide the honeſt but unſucceſsful Robert Devereux, Earl of Eſſex; they unanimouſly voted Sir Thomas Fairfax to be their General in his room; and he, being eaſy, and forward to undertake or execute any thing that he was put upon, was the more readily choſen by the two then prevailing parties of Preſbyterians and Independants. To him Oliver Cromwell was joined with the title of Lieutenant-General, but with intention of being his governor (i); and he was indeed the ſpring of all his ſucceeding motions. Sir Thomas, being thus voted Commander in Chief of the Parliament's army on the 21ſt of January, 1644-5 (k), received orders from the Parliament ſpeedily to come up from the North to London (l). Accordingly he repaired privately thither, Feb. 18, and, the next day, was brought by four of the members into the Houſe of Commons, where he was highly complimented by the Speaker, and received his commiſſion of General (m). The 15th of the ſame month, an Ordinance was made, for raiſing and maintaining of forces under his command [N]: it having been voted, a few days before, that he ſhould nominate all the commanders in his army, to be taken out of any of the other armies, with the approbation of both Houſes (n). March 25, the Parliament ordered him 1500l. (o). The 3d of April, he went from London to Windſor, where he appointed the general rendezvous: and continued there till the laſt day of that month, new-framing and modelling the army: or rather Cromwell doing it in his name. For, as Mr. Rapin well obſerves (p), Cromwell had ſuch an influence over him, that he made him do whatever he pleaſed. April 16, he was appointed, by both Houſes, Governor of Hull (q). In the mean time, Taunton, in Somerſetſhire, one of the Parliament's garriſons, being cloſely beſieged by the Royaliſts, Sir Thomas Fairfax received orders to haſten to its relief, with 8000 horſe and foot (r). He began his March, [N] An Ordinance was made, for raiſing and maintaining of the forces under his command.] This Ordinance imported, that there ſhould be forthwith raiſed and formed, for the defence of the King and Parliament, the true Proteſtant Religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom, an army conſiſting of 6000 horſe to be diſtributed into eleven regiments; and of 1000 dragooniers, to be diſtributed into ten companies; and of 14400 foot, to be diſtributed into twelve regiments, each regiment of foot to conſiſt of twelve hundred, and each ſuch regiment to be diſtributed into ten companies. For their maintenance, there was impoſed, upon nineteen of the counties and cities in England, the monthly ſum of fifty-three thouſand four hundred and fifty-ſix pounds; which was raiſed in the ſame manner as our preſent Land-tax (23).

May

May 1, and by the 7th had reached Blandford in Dorſetſhire (s): but, the King taking the field from Oxford, with ſtrong reinforcements brought by the Princes Rupert and Maurice, Sir Thomas was ordered by the Parliament to ſend 3000 foot and 1500 horſe to relieve Taunton, and himſelf to return, with the reſt of his forces, to join Oliver Cromwell and Major-General Browne, and attend the King's motions (t). The 14th of May he was come back as far as Newbury (u); where having reſted three nights, he went and faced Dennington-caſtle, and took a few priſoners. Thence he proceeded to lay ſiege to Oxford, as he was directed by the Committee of both kingdoms, and ſat down before it the 22d. But, before he had made any progreſs in this ſiege, he received orders to draw near the King, who had taken Leiceſter by ſtorm, May 31, and was threatening the eaſtern aſſociated counties (w). Sir Thomas therefore riſing from before Oxford, June 5, arrived the ſame day at Marſh-Gibbon, in Buckinghamſhire; on the 11th he was at Wootton, and the next day at Gilſborough, in Northamptonſhire: where he kept his head-quarters till the 14th, when he engaged the King's forces, at the fatal and deciſive battle of Naſeby [O], and obtained a complete victory (x). The King, after that, retiring into Wales, Sir Thomas went and laid ſiege on the 16th to Leiceſter, which ſurrendered on the 18th (y). He proceeded, on the 22d, to Warwick; and thence (with a diſpoſition either to go over the Severn towards the King, or to move Weſtward as he ſhould be ordered) he marched on through Glouceſterſhire towards Marlborough, where he arrived the 28th (z). And here he received orders from the Parliament, to haſten to the relief of Taunton, which was beſieged again by the Royaliſts; letters being ſent at the ſame time into the aſſociated counties for recruits, and the arrears of pay for his army (a). But, July 2, upon his coming to Blandford, he was informed, that the Lord Goring had drawn off his horſe from before Taunton, and left his foot in the paſſage to block up that place, marching himſelf with the horſe towards Langport (b). Sir Thomas Fairfax, therefore, advancing againſt him, defeated him there on the 10th of July (c); and, the next day, went and ſummoned Bridgewater, which was taken by ſtorm on the 22d (d). He became alſo maſter of Bath the 30th of the ſame month; and then laid cloſe ſiege to Sherborne-caſtle, which was likewiſe taken by ſtorm Auguſt 15. And, having beſieged the rich and famous city of Briſtol from the 22d of Auguſt to the 10th of September [P], it was ſurrendered to him by Prince Rupert (e); at which the King was ſo exceſſively angry [Q], that he ordered the Prince to go and ſeek his ſubſiſtence ſomewhere beyond ſea (f). After this laborious expedition, the General reſted ſome days at Bath, having ſent out parties to reduce the caſtles of the Deviſes and Berkley, and other garriſons between the Weſt and London; and on the 23d moved from Bath to the Deviſes, and thence to Warminſter on the 27th, where he ſtayed till October 8, when he went to Lyme in Dorſetſhire (g). From this place he came to Tiverton, of which he became maſter on the 19th (h); and then, as he could not undertake a formal ſiege in the winter ſeaſon, he blocked up the ſtrong city of Exeter, which did not ſurrender till the 13th of April following (i): in the mean time, he took Dartmouth by ſtorm, January 18, 1645-6 (k); and ſeveral forts and garriſons at [O] When he engaged the King's forces, at the fatal and deciſive battle of Naſeby.] As I am not writing a hiſtory of England, I ſhall not enter into the particulars of this battle, but only take notice of the ſhare Sir Thomas Fairfax had in it. He commanded the main body of foot; and behaved with uncommon valour and bravery (24). During the engagement, having had his helmet beat off, he rode bareheaded up and down from one part of his army to another, to ſee how they ſtood, and what advantage might be gained: and, coming up to his own life-guard, commanded by Col. Charles Doyley, he was told by him, that he expoſed himſelf to too much danger, and the whole army thereby, riding bareheaded in the fields, and ſo many bullets flying about him; and Doyley offered the General his helmet, but he refuſed it, ſaying, 'It is well enough, Charles (25).'——This viſible indifference appears in the encouragement given to the two contending parties, which may account for their different ſucceſs almoſt in every battle. The King's forces fought for him, not for themſelves; and both officers and ſoldiers were in general negligent and unfaithful in their duty (26). But the Parliamentarian ſoldiers fought for themſelves, for booty and plunder, at leaſt for very great rewards, and could not but mend their fortunes by fiſhing in troubled waters; no wonder therefore that they fought with ſo much fury and reſolution.

[P] And having beſieged the rich and famous city of Briſtol from the 22d of Auguſt to the 10th of September.] Sir Thomas Fairfax, in his firſt ſummons to Prince Rupert, has theſe remarkable words; which are ſubmitted to the reader's conſideration.—— 'Sir, 'the Crown of England is and will be where it ought 'to be; we fight to maintain it there. But the King, 'miſled by evil counſellors, or through a ſeduced 'heart, hath left his Parliament, under God, the 'beſt aſſurance of his crown and family: the maintaining of this ſchiſme is the ground of this unhappy 'war on your part: and what ſad effects it hath produced in the three kingdomes is viſible to all men. 'To maintain the rights of the crown and kingdom 'jointly; a principal part whereof is, that the King 'in ſupream acts is not to be adviſed by men of whom 'the law takes no notice, but by his Parliament, the 'great counſel of the kingdom, in whom (as much 'as man is capable of) he hears all his people as it 'were at once adviſing him, and in which multitude 'of councellours lyes his ſafety, and his peoples intereſt; and, to ſee him right in this, hath been the 'conſtant and faithfull endeavour of the Parliament. 'And to bring theſe wicked inſtruments to juſtice that 'have miſled him is a principal ground of our fighting (27).'—But, from theſe plauſible and righteous ſentiments, Sir Thomas ſeems to have departed afterwards.

(27) Shrigge, p. 98.

[Q] At which the King was ſo exceſſively angry.] And the more, as the Prince, in a letter to his Majeſty of the 12th of Auguſt, had aſſured him, 'that, 'if no mutiny happened, he would keep Briſtol for 'four months (28).'

different times. Feb. 16, he defeated the Lord Hopton near Torrington (l) [R]. This Nobleman retreating with his broken forces into Cornwall, Sir Thomas followed him: in purſuit of whom he came to Launceſſon Feb. 25, and to Bodmin March 2. On the 4th, Mount Edgecombe was ſurrendered to him; and Fowey about the ſame time (m). At laſt the Parliament army approaching Truro, where Lord Hopton had his head-quarters; and he being ſo hemmed in as to remain without a poſſibility of eſcaping; Sir Thomas, on the 5th of March, ſent and offered him honourable terms, if he would capitulate [S]. After ſome delays and difficulties, the Lord Hopton accepted of them: and a treaty was ſigned by Commiſſioners on both ſides, March 14; in purſuance of which, the Royaliſts, conſiſting of above 5000 horſe, were diſbanded; and took an oath never to bear arms againſt the Parliament (n). But, before the treaty was ſigned, the Lord Hopton, and Arthur Lord Capel, retired to Scilly, whence they paſſed into Jerſey, April 17, with Charles Prince of Wales, Sir Edward Hyde, and other perſons of diſtinction (o). Thus the King's army in the Weſt being entirely diſperſed by the vigilance and wonderful ſucceſs of General Fairfax, he returned, March 31, to the ſiege of Exeter, which ſurrendered to him upon articles, the 13th of April, as I have already obſerved (p): and with the taking of this city ended our General's weſtern expedition. Having entirely ſubdued thoſe parts, which were the greateſt ſtrength and almoſt the only refuge of the Royaliſts, he marched, with wonderful ſpeed (q), towards Oxford, the moſt conſiderable garriſon remaining in the King's hands. Setting out therefore from Exeter April 16, he came, on the 1ſt of May, with his army before that city, and began to lay ſiege to it (r). The King, who was there, afraid of being encloſed, privately, and in diſguiſe, departed thence on the 27th of April; and, May 4, put himſelf into the hands of the treacherous Scots (s). Oxford ſurrendered upon articles, June 24 [T], as did Wallingford, July 22 (t). After the reduction of theſe places, Sir Thomas went and beſieged Ragland-caſtle, in Monmouthſhire, the property of Henry Somerſet, Marquis of Worceſter, which yielded Aug. 19 (u). And thus, before Michaelmas 1646, the unhappy King Charles I. had neither army nor fortreſs left in England. The next employment required of the General, was to diſband Major-General Maſſey's brigade, which he did at the Deviſes. About that time he was ſeized with a violent fit of the ſtone, under which he laboured many days. As ſoon as he was recovered, he took a journey to London; where he arrived November 12, being met ſome miles off by great crowds of people, and the city militia. The next day, both Houſes of Parliament agreed to congratulate his coming to town, and to give him thanks for his faithful ſervices and wiſe conduct [U]: which they did the day following, waiting upon him at his houſe in Queen-

As, namely, in 1645, they ſent him a jewel of great value, ſet with diamonds, which was tied in a blue ribbond, and put about his neck (33). In 1646, an ordinance was made for ſettling 5000*l.* a year upon him and his heirs (34). And 4000*l.* a year was granted to him out of the Duke of Buckingham's eſtate (35): which probably was part of the 5000*l.* ſettled upon him by the parliament. ſtreet (w). Hardly had he had time to reſt, when he was called upon to convoy the two hundred thouſand pounds that had been granted to the Scotiſh army; the price of their delivering up, or betraying, their ſovereign King Charles [W]. For that purpoſe he ſet out from London, December 18, with a ſufficient force (x), carrying at the ſame time 50,000l. for his own army. The King being delivered by the Scots to the Parliament's Commiſſioners at Newcaſtle, Jan. 30, 1646-7, Sir Thomas went and met him, Feb. 15, beyond Nottingham, in his way to Holmby; and his Majeſty ſtopping his horſe, Sir Thomas alighted, and kiſſed his hand; and afterwards mounted, and diſcourſed with him as they rode along (y) [X]. The 5th of March following, after long debate in Parliament, he was voted General of the forces that were to be continued. He came to Cambridge the 12th of the ſame month, where he was highly careſſed and complimented, and created Maſter of Arts (z) [Y].

Hitherto, the crafty and ambitious Oliver Cromwell had permitted him to enjoy in all reſpects the ſupreme command, at leaſt to outward appearance. And, under his conduct, the army's rapid ſucceſs, after their new model, had much ſurpaſſed the expectation of the moſt ſanguine of their maſters, the parliament. The queſtion now was, to diſband the majority of them after their work was done, and to employ a part of the reſt in the reduction of Ireland. But either of the two appeared to all of them intolerable. For, many having, from the dregs of the people, riſen to the higheſt commands; and by plunderings and violence amaſſing daily great treaſures; they could not bear the thoughts of loſing ſuch great advantages. To maintain themſelves therefore in the poſſeſſion of them, Cromwell, and his ſon-in-law Ireton, as good a contriver as himſelf, but a much better writer and ſpeaker, deviſe how to raiſe a mutiny in the army againſt the Parliament. To this end they ſpread a whiſper among the ſoldiery, 'that the parliament, now they had 'the King, intended to diſband them; to cheat them of their arrears; and to ſend them 'into Ireland, to be deſtroyed by the Iriſh.' The army, enraged at this, were taught by Ireton to erect a council among themſelves, of two ſoldiers out of every troop and every company, to conſult for the good of the army, and to aſſiſt at the Council of War, and adviſe for the peace and ſafety of the kingdom. Theſe were called Adjutators, or Agitators (a), and wholly under Cromwell's influence and direction; the moſt active of them being his avowed creatures (b). Sir Thomas ſaw with uneaſineſs his power on the army uſurped by theſe Agitators, the forerunners of confuſion and anarchy, whoſe deſign (as he obſerves) was to raiſe their own fortunes upon the public ruin: and that made him reſolve to lay down his commiſſion (c). But he was over-perſuaded by the heads of the Independent faction to hold it [Z] till he had accompliſhed their deſperate projects, of rendering themſelves maſters not only of the parliament, but of the whole kingdom; for, he joined in the ſeveral petitions and proceedings of the army that tended to deſtroy the Parliament's power (d). About the beginning of June, he advanced towards London, to awe the Parliament, though both Houſes deſired his army might not come within fifteen miles of the ſame (e); June 15, he was a party in the charge againſt eleven of the Members of the Houſe of Commons (f) [AA]; in Auguſt, he eſpouſed

[W] The price of their delivering up, or betraying, their ſovereign King Charles.] Mr. Rapin takes great pains, in endeavouring to clear his friends the Scots from the imputation of having ſold the King to the Parliament (37). But if the Parliament did not actually give that ſum for this very conſideration, it is certain, that it very much ſecured and haſtened the payment of the Scotch army's arrears; which might have remained long unſatisfied. Though it is true that they were become very burthenſome to the northern counties (38): But, if they had grown too troubleſome, as they were no longer neceſſary, they would undoubtedly have been ſerved in the ſame manner as they afterwards were by Oliver Cromwell. Mr. Whitelock's following words deſerve to be duly weighed. 'Now there began to be an 'underſtanding between ſome here and the Scots, for 'their delivery up of the King's perſon to the Parlia-'ment (39).' And the ſame author mentions (40), that the King ſaid, 'he was bought and ſold.'

(43) Clarendon, Vol. V. p. 45.

[AA] June 15, he was a party in the charge againſt eleven of the members of the Houſe of Commons.] Theſe eleven accuſed members, were, Denzil Hollis, Eſq. Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, Major-General Maſſey, John Glyn, Eſq. Recorder of London, Walter Long, Edward Harley, and Antony Nicholl, Eſqrs. (44). The ſubſtance of the charge againſt them only amounted to ſome pretended 'violent or 'oppreſſive ways, tending (as the words of the accu-'ſation run) to overthrow the rights and liberties of 'the ſubjects of this nation.' But their real fault (which was far from being a fault) conſiſted in their oppoſing the army's unlawful and arbitrary proceedings: endeavouring to diſband it; or ſending part into Ireland: which, as it tended to ruin and put a period to the exorbitant power of the army, was in their eyes an unpardonable crime. No wonder, therefore, that they oppoſed to the utmoſt all attempts towards their own diſſolution; and endeavoured to exclude from parliament, or deſtroy, all thoſe that were for pulling them down from their exalted height, and ſending thom back to their mechanic trades, or reducing them to thair original meanneſs, obſcurity, and rags. And thus, as Mr. Whitelock well obſerves (45), 'The 'army whom the parliament had raiſed, paid, and 'commiſeſpouſed the Speakers of both Houſes, and the ſixty-ſix members that had fled to the army, and betrayed the privileges of Parliament: and, entering London, Auguſt 6, reſtored them in a kind of triumph. For which he received the thanks of both houſes; and was appointed Conſtable of the Tower (g). He was no way concerned in the violent removal of the King from Holmby [BB], by Cornet Joyce, on the 3d of June; and waited with great reſpect upon his Majeſty at Sir John Cutts's houſe near Cambridge (h). Being ordered, on the 15th of the ſame month, by the Parliament, to deliver the perſon of the King to ſuch perſons as both Houſes ſhould appoint; that he might be brought to Richmond, where propoſitions were to be preſented to him for a ſafe and well-grounded peace (i): inſtead of complying (though he ſeemed to do ſo) he carried his Majeſty from place to place, according to the ſeveral motions of the army [CC]. And yet he outwardly expreſſed, upon moſt occaſions, a due reſpect for him [DD]; ſo that his ambiguous conduct was owing to the fear he had, leſt the Parliament ſhould become maſters of the King's perſon. Thus, not having the will or reſolution to oppoſe what he had not power enough to prevent, he reſigned himſelf entirely to Cromwell [EE]; and, though he wiſhed nothing that Cromwell did, yet he contributed to bring it all to paſs (k). It was this undoubtedly that made him concur, Jan. 9, 1647-8, in that cruel Declaration of the army, wherein they adhered to the Commons votes, of 'No further 'addreſſes or application to the King; and reſolved to ſtand by the Parliament, in what 'ſhould be further neceſſary for ſettling and ſecuring the Parliament and kingdom, 'without the King and againſt him (l).' His father dying at York, March 13, he became poſſeſſed of his title and eſtate; and was appointed Keeper of Pontefract-caſtle, Cuſtos Rotulorum of Yorkſhire, &c. in his room (m). But his father's death made no alteration in his conduct, he remaining the ſame ſervile or deluded tool to Cromwell's ambition. For, he not only ſent extraordinary ſupplies, and took all

[BB] He was no way concerned in the violent removal of the King from Holmby.] The reaſons, ſent to the General by the authors of this violence, for their committing it, were, 'That they had intimation of a 'deſign, which they were able to make good, of ſome 'to ſurprize the King (46);' viz. the parliament, or ſome by their order. For, as one obſerves, the King was then the golden apple contended for by the parliament and the army.—Sir Thomas gives the following account of that affair. 'Being at Saffron-Walden, I 'had notice that Cornet Joyce, an Arch-Agitator, who 'quartered about Oxford, had ſeized on the King's 'perſon, removed his guards, &c. So ſoon as I heard 'of it, I immediately ſent away two regiments of 'horſe, commanded by Colonel Whaley, to ſet all 'things again in their due courſe and order. But, be-'fore he came to Holmby, the King was advanced 'two or three miles on his way to Cambridge, attend-'ed by Joyce, where Colonel Whaley acquainted the 'King, he was ſent by the General to let him know 'how much he was troubled at thoſe great inſolencies 'that had been committed ſo near his perſon; and as 'he had not the leaſt knowledge of them before they 'were done, ſo he had omitted no time in ſeeking to 'remove that force, which he had orders from me to 'ſee done; and therefore he deſired his Majeſty that 'he would be pleaſed to return again to Holmby, 'where all things ſhould be ſettled again in as much 'order and quietneſs as they were before. And alſo he 'deſired the Commiſſioners of Parliament to re-aſſume 'their charge, and attend the King as uſual. But the 'King refuſed to return, and the Commiſſioners to act; 'whereupon Colonel Whaley urged them to it, ſaying, 'He had an expreſs command to ſee all things well 'ſettled again about his Majeſty, which could not be 'done, but by his returning again to Holmby. The 'King ſaid poſitively he would not do it; ſo the Co-'lonel preſt him no more, having indeed a ſpecial di-'rection from me to uſe all tenderneſs and reſpect, as 'was due to his Majeſty.'—The next day I waited 'on his Majeſty [at Sir John Cutts's houſe], it being 'alſo my buſineſs to perſuade his return to Holmby, 'but he was otherwiſe reſolved, the Agitators having 'brought him into an opinion that the army was for 'him.—That it might appear what a real trouble 'this act was to me,—I called for a council of war 'to proceed againſt Joyce, for this high offence and 'breach of the articles of war; but the officers, whe-'ther for fear of the diſtempered ſoldiers, or rather 'as I ſuſpected a ſecret allowance of what was done, 'made all my endeavours in this ineffectual (47).'

[CC] According to the ſeveral motions of the army.] The army was in the end of March 1647, at Walden; May 26, &c. at St. Edmund's-bury; June 4, &c. at Newmarket; June 10, at Royſton; June 14, &c. at St. Alban's; June 25, at Barhamſtead; the 26th, at Uxbridge; the 30th, at High-Wickham; July 21, at Ayleſbury; the 24th, at Bedford; the 31ſt, at Uxbridge; Aug. 2, at Colebrook; the 4th, at Hammerſmith; the 6th, at London; the 7th, at Croydon; the 14th, at Kingſton, the 28th, at Putney; in November, at Hertford; in December, &c. at Windſor. ——And the King was, till June 3, at Holmby; the 5th, at Huntington; the 8th, at Sir John Cutts's; the 11th, at Newmarket; the 24th, at Royſton; the 26th, at Hatfield; July 2, at Windſor; the 3d, at Caverſham; the 21ſt, at Woburne; the 24th, at Latimer's; the 24th, at Hampton-Court (48): where he continued till the 11th of November following, when he eſcaped into the Iſle of Wight.

[DD] And yet he outwardly expreſſed, upon moſt occaſions, a due reſpect for him.] For, in letters from him to the parliament, he declares, that he and his officers 'endeavoured only the ſettlement of the pub-'lic peace and rights of the nation; and aſſured the 'King, that this being done with his concurrence, the 'rights of his Majeſty and his family ſhould be pro-'vided for; and in the mean time his Majeſty ſhould 'find from them all perſonal civilities and reſpects, and 'ſuch freedom as may ſtand with ſafety, and the truſt 'lying upon them.——That they are no enemies to 'monarchy and civil government.——That they con-'ceived, to avoid all harſhneſſes, and afford all kind-'neſſes to his Majeſty, conſiſting with the peace and 'ſafety of the kingdom, is the moſt chriſtian, honour-'able, and prudent way; and that tender, equitable, 'and moderate dealing towards his Majeſty, his fami-'ly, and party, is the moſt hopeful courſe, to take 'away the ſeeds of war, and feuds amongſt us and our 'poſterity, and to procure a laſting peace (49).'

(49) Whitelock, p. 258.

[EE] He reſigned himſelf entirely to Cromwell.] About this time, being tired with multiplicity of buſineſs and petitions at London, he appointed Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, and divers other officers, and ſuch field-officers as were in town, or any five of them, to meet every day in Whitehall, to receive petitions, and conſider of buſineſs relating to the army, and for the better preparing of diſpatches (50).

pains imaginable for reducing Col. Poyer in Wales, but alſo quelled, with the utmoſt zeal and induſtry, an inſurrection of apprentices and others in London, April 9, who had declared for God and King Charles (n). The 1ſt of the ſame month, he removed his head-quarters to St. Edmund's-bury; and, upon the Royaliſts ſeizing Berwick and Carliſle, and the apprehenſion of the Scots entering England, he was deſired, May 9, by the Parliament, to advance in perſon into the North, to reduce thoſe places, and to prevent any danger from the threatened invaſion. Accordingly he began to march that way, the 20th (o). But he was ſoon recalled to quell an inſurrection in Kent, headed by George Goring, Earl of Norwich, and Sir William Waller. Advancing therefore againſt them from London, in the latter end of May, he defeated a conſiderable party of them at Maidſtone June 2, with his uſual valour (p) [FF]. But the Earl, and about 500 of the Royaliſts, getting over the Thames at Greenwich into Eſſex, June 3, they were joined by ſeveral parties brought by Sir Charles Lucas, and Arthur Lord Capel, which made up their numbers about 400; and went and ſhut themſelves up in Colcheſter on the 12th of June (q). The Lord Fairfax, informed of their motions, paſſed over with his forces at Graveſend, with ſo much expedition, that he arrived before Colcheſter, June 13. Immediately he ſummons the Royaliſts to ſurrender; which they refuſing, he attacks them the ſame afternoon with the utmoſt fury. But, being repulſed, he reſolved June 14, to block up the place, in order to ſtarve the Royaliſts ſhut up therein into a compliance. Theſe endured a ſevere and tedious ſiege of eleven weeks, not ſurrendering till Auguſt 28, and feeding for about five weeks chiefly on horſe-fleſh; all their endeavours for obtaining peace on honourable terms being ineffectual [GG]. This affair is the moſt exceptionable part in the Lord Fairfax's conduct. For, he granted the worſe terms to that poor town than to any other in the whole courſe of the war; he endeavoured to deſtroy it as much as poſſible; he laid an exorbitant fine, or ranſom, of 12,000*l.* upon the inhabitants, to excuſe them from being plundered; and he vented his revenge and fury upon Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Liſle [HH], who had behaved in the beſt and moſt inoffenſive manner during the ſiege, ſparing that buffoon the Earl of Norwich, whoſe behaviour had been quite different (r): ſo that his name and memory there ought to be for ever deteſtable. After his mighty exploits againſt a poor and unfortified town, he took a kind of triumphant progreſs to Ipſwich, Yarmouth, Norwich, St. Edmund's-bury, Harwich, Merſey, and Maldon (s). About the beginning of December he came to London, to awe that city and the Parliament, and to forward the proceedings againſt the King; quartering himſelf in the royal palace of Whitehall (t): and, 'by 'ſpecial order from him and the council of the army [II],' it was, that ſeveral members of [FF] With his uſual valour.] Though he was very much diſabled and indiſpoſed, and had a great fit of the gout then upon him, yet he could not be prevailed upon to remain with the main body of the army in the field; but, with his foot wrapped up, he mounted on horſeback, led on his men in the greateſt danger, and was one of the firſt in all this action. Both ſides did their parts with much valour and reſolution, and there was ſcarcely any action in the war more deſperate and hazardous, and better performed than this (51).

(51) Whitelock, p. 309.

[GG] All their endeavours for obtaining peace on honourable terms being ineffectual.] For, as early as June 19, they propoſed, 'That there might be a treaty 'between both armies for a peace:' adding, that 'it 'was the general peace of the kingdom they contended 'for.' But Sir Thomas replied, 'That ſuch a treaty, 'and for ſuch a peace, was not the proper work of 'himſelf, or the army, but theirs that had employed 'him:' and he offered only, that, if within 24 hours they laid down their arms, the common ſoldiers ſhould have leave to depart to their ſeveral homes; and the officers paſſes to go beyond ſea. His terms grew much higher afterwards (52).

(52) See Hiſt. of Colcheſter, B. 57. *

[HH] And he vented his revenge and fury upon Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Liſle.] From the very beginning of the ſiege, he expreſſed the utmoſt paſſion and reſentment againſt Sir Charles Lucas in particular (53): and, in his Memorials (54), is ſo injurious to his memory, as to call him, and Sir George, mere ſoldiers of fortune. His words are, 'But Sir Charles 'Lucas, and Sir George Liſle, being mere ſoldiers of 'fortune, and falling into our hands by chance of 'war, were executed.' Whereas Sir Charles was no more a ſoldier of fortune than his Lordſhip; for he had an eſtate in Eſſex, till diſpoſſeſſed of it by plundering rebels; and was heir to the honour and eſtate of his brother John Lord Lucas, for want of iſſue male. In his letter to the parliament, his Lordſhip ſeems to queſtion, whether he had not prejudiced the honour and juſtice of parliament in their execution. '—For ſome ſatisfaction, ſays he, to military juſtice, 'and in part of avenge for the innocent blood they 'have cauſed to be ſpilt, and the trouble, damage, 'and miſchiefe they have brought upon the towne, 'this country, and the kingdome, I have, with the 'advice of a Counſell of Warre of the chiefe officers 'both of the country-forces and the army, cauſed two 'of them, who were rendered at mercy, to be ſhot to 'death before any of them had quarter aſſured them. 'The perſons, pitched upon for this example, were, 'Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Liſle, in whoſe 'military execution I hope your Lordſhips will not 'find cauſe to think your honour or juſtice preju-'diced (55).'

[II] And by ſpecial order from him and the council of the army.] Theſe are Mr. Whitelock's expreſs words; but the Lord Fairfax clears himſelf from it, in the following manner. 'To prepare a way to this 'work [the King's Trial] this agitating council did 'firſt intend to remove all out of the parliament who 'were like to oppoſe them, and carried it on with 'ſuch ſecrecy, as I had not the leaſt intimation of it 'till it was done, as ſome of the members of the 'houſe can witneſs, with whom I was, at that very 'time upon ſpecial buſineſs, when that attempt was 'made by Colonel Pride upon the parliament, which 'I proteſt I never had any knowledge of till it was 'done. The reaſon why it was ſo ſecretly carried, 'that I ſhould have no notice of it, was, becauſe I al-'ways prevented thoſe deſigns when I knew them (56).' The Lord Clarendon always confirms the ſame. 'No-'body owned this act of violence in the excluſion of 'ſo many members: there was no order made for 'it by the houſe. Fairfax, the General, knew nothing 'of it, and the guards themſelves being aſked "what 'authority they had," gave no other anſwer, but 'that of the Houſe of Commons were ſecluded and impriſoned, the 6th and 7th of that month (u); he being, as one expreſſes it, lulled in a kind of ſtupidity (w). He was foremoſt in the liſt of the King's Judges, but refuſed to act (x), probably by his Lady's perſuaſion [KK]. Feb. 14, 1648–9, he was voted to be one of the new Council of State (y). But, on the 19th he refuſed to ſubſcribe the Teſt, appointed by Parliament, for approving all that was done concerning the King and Kingſhip (z). March 31, he was voted General of all the forces in England and Ireland, more to his honour than intrinſic power (a). In May, he marched againſt the levellers, who were grown very numerous, and began to be troubleſome and formidable in Oxfordſhire, and utterly routed them at Burford (b). Thence, on the 22d of the ſame month, he repaired to Oxford with Oliver Cromwell, and other officers, where he was highly feaſted; and created Doctor of Laws (c). Next, upon apprehenſion of the like riſings in other places, he went and viewed the caſtles and fortifications in the iſle of Wight, and at Southampton, and Portſmouth; and near Guildford had a rendezvous of the army, which he exhorted to obedience (d). June 4, he was feaſted with other officers, &c. by the city of London, and preſented with a large and weighty baſon and ewer of beaten gold (e). In June 1650, upon the Scots declaring for King Charles II. the juncto of the Council of State having taken a reſolution to be beforehand, and not to ſtay to be invaded from Scotland, but to carry firſt the war into that kingdom; General Fairfax, being conſulted, ſeemed to approve of the deſign. But afterwards, by the perſuaſions of his Lady, and of the Preſbyterian Miniſters, he declared himſelf unſatisfied, that there was a juſt ground for the Parliament of England to ſend their army to invade Scotland: and reſolved to lay down his commiſſion rather than engage in that affair [LL]. Whereupon, on the 26th, the ordinance whereby he was appointed commander in chief of all the forces of the Parliament being repealed, that high truſt was immediately committed to Oliver Cromwell (f); who was glad to ſee him removed, as being no longer neceſſary, but rather an obſtacle to his farther ambitious deſigns. For a kind of compenſation, the Parliament ſettled an annual revenue of five thouſand pounds upon his Lordſhip (g). Being thus releaſed from all public employment, he went and lived quietly at his own houſe in Nun-Appleton in Yorkſhire; always earneſtly wiſhing and praying (as we are aſſured) for the reſtitution of the Royal Family, and fully reſolved to lay hold on the firſt good opportunity to contribute his part

'that "they had orders" (57).' But the ſame noble author obſerves in the foregoing page, that the committee of parliament that was appointed to confer with the General, for the better procuring a good intelligence and correſpondence between the army and the parliament, were forced to attend full three hours before they could be admitted to his preſence; and then he told them ſullenly and ſuperciliouſly, 'that the 'way to correſpond with the army was to comply 'with their remonſtrance;' and the next morning a guard of muſqueteers was placed to ſeclude the members.

[KK] He was foremoſt in the liſt of the King's Judges, but refuſed to act, probably by his Lady's perſuaſion.] She exclaimed aloud againſt the proceedings of the High-court, and the irreverent uſage of the King by his ſubjects, inſomuch, that the court was interrupted (58): for, her huſband, the Lord Fairfax, being called firſt as one of the judges, and no anſwer being made, the crier called him the ſecond time, when there was a voice heard that ſaid, 'he had 'more wit than to be there,' which put the court into ſome diſorder; and, ſomebody aſking who it was, there was no anſwer, but a little murmuring. But, preſently, when the impeachment was read, and that expreſſion uſed, of 'All the good people of England,' the ſame voice, in a louder tone, anſwered, 'No, nor the 'hundredth part of them:' upon which, one of the officers bid the ſoldiers give fire into that box whence the preſumptuous words were uttered. But it was quickly diſcerned that it was the General's wife, who had uttered both thoſe ſharp ſayings; who was preſently perſuaded or forced to leave the place, to prevent any new diſorder.—Having been bred in Holland, ſhe had not that reverence for the Church of England as ſhe ought to have had, and ſo had unhappily concurred in her huſband's entering into rebellion, never imagining what miſery it would bring upon the kingdom; and now abhorred the work in hand, as much as any body could do, and did all ſhe could to hinder her huſband from acting any part in it (59).—A. Wood relates ſome particular circumſtances of the Lord Fairfax's behaviour, at the time of the King's murder, that ſhew ſuch extreme hypocriſy, or ſo much indolence, ſtupidity, and eaſineſs in being impoſed upon, that, they are hardly credible.——— 'Tis 'true,' ſays he, 'that before the King was beheaded, 'he did uſe his power and intereſt to have the execu'tion deferred for ſome days, forbearing his coming 'among the officers, and did fully reſolve with his 'own regiment to prevent the execution, or have it 'deferred till he could make a party in the army to 'ſecond his deſign: but, behold his policy! all the 'morning of that day on which the King was be'headed, and the time when he was beheaded, he was, 'with certain officers of the army, at prayer, or in 'diſcourſe, or both, in Major Tho. Harriſon's apart'ment in Whitehall, (being a room at the higher end 'of the gallery looking towards the Privy-garden) and 'knew nothing of it, as it doth appear by this paſſage. 'When his Majeſty was beheaded, and his corps 'thereupon immediately coffined and covered with a 'black velvet pall, Bp. Juxon, who attended him on 'the ſcaffold, and Thomas Herbert, the only groom 'of his bedchamber that was then left, did go with 'the ſaid corps to the back-ſtairs to have it embalmed; and, Mr. Herbert, after the body had been depoſited, 'meeting with the General Fairfax, aſked him, "how 'the King did?" Whereupon Herbert looking very 'ſtrangely upon him, told him, that "the King was 'beheaded;" at which he ſeemed much ſurprized '(60).'

[LL] And reſolved to lay down his commiſſion rather than engage in that affair.] A committee from the Council of State went to confer with him, upon that ſubject, in a room in Whitehall; but (tho' they went firſt to prayer, that God would direct them in this buſineſs, and Cromwell and moſt of the reſt prayed) yet the prayers of theſe hypocrites could not be countenanced with a heavenly influence, nor their reaſons and arguments prevail upon his Lordſhip. And, if they had, very ſorry and diſappointed would many of them have been; as Mr. Whitelock, a member of this committee, obſerves in the following words— 'none 'of the Committee ſo earneſt to perſuade the General 'to continue his commiſſion as Cromwell and the 'Soldiers. Yet there was cauſe enough to believe 'that they did not overmuch deſire it (61).'

towards it; which made him always looked upon with a jealous eye by the uſurpers of that time. As ſoon as he was invited by General Monk to aſſiſt him againſt Lambert's army, he chearfully embraced the occaſion, and appeared, on the 3d of December, 1659, at the head of a body of gentlemen of Yorkſhire; and, upon the reputation and authority of his name, the Iriſh brigade, of 1200 horſe, forſook Lambert's army, and joined him. The conſequence was, the immediate breaking of all Lambert's forces, which gave General Monk an eaſy march into England (b). The 1ſt of January 1659-60, his Lordſhip made himſelf maſter of York (i); and, on the 2d of the ſame month, was choſen by the Rump Parliament one of the Council of State, as he was again on the 23d of February enſuing (k). March 29, he was elected one of the Knights for the County of York, in the Healing Parliament (l): and was at the head of the Committee appointed, May 3, by the Houſe of Commons, to go and attend King Charles II. at the Hague; to deſire him to make a ſpeedy return to his Parliament, and to the exerciſe of his kingly office (m). May 16, he waited upon his Majeſty with the reſt [MM]; and atoned in ſome meaſure for all paſt offences, by readily concurring and aſſiſting in his Reſtoration. After the diſſolution of the ſhort Healing Parliament, he retired again to his ſeat in the country; where he lived in a private manner, till his death, which happened November 12, 1671, in the 60th year of his age (n) [NN]. Several letters, remonſtrances, and other papers, ſubſcribed with his name, are preſerved in Ruſhworth and other Collections, being publiſhed during the time he was General; but he diſowns moſt of them [OO]. After his deceaſe, ſome 'ſhort memorials, written by himſelf,' were publiſhed; which do him no great honour [PP]. The Lord Fairfax, as to his perſon, was tall, but not above the juſt proportion (o); and of a gloomy and melancholy diſpoſition. He ſtammered a little, and was a bad orator on the moſt plauſible occaſions (p). As to the qualities of his mind; he was religious in the way he profeſſed, which was Preſbyterianiſm (q) [QQ]: of a good natural diſpoſition (r): a great lover of learning, having contributed to the edition of the Polyglott, and other large works (s): and a particular admirer of the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Great Britain, witneſs the encouragement he gave to Mr. Dodſworth (t). He was of a meek and humble carriage, and but of few words in diſcourſe and council; yet, when his judgment and reaſon were ſatisfied, he was unalterable; and often ordered things expreſſly contrary to the judgments of all his council (u). His valour was unqueſtionable. He was daring, and no ſelf-ſeeker (w). And in action, in the field, he appeared ſo highly tranſported, that ſcarcely any durſt ſpeak a word to him, and he would ſeem like a man diſtracted and furious (x). His being outwitted by Cromwell, or ſuffering himſelf to become the tool and property of that wicked ambitious man, was his greateſt blemiſh. Happy would it have been for the nation, happy for himſelf, if he had retired ſooner [RR].

Brian Fairfax, Eſq. the editor of his Lordſhip's Memorials, concludes his character with the following encomium: 'that, ſo long as unfeigned piety towards 'God, invincible courage joyned with wonderful mo-'deſty, and exceeding good nature: juſtice and cha-

(70) Epistle Dedicatory, p. ix. x.

 [Of the Lord Fairfax's exploits, as a commander and a general, no farther notice is necessary to be taken than what is already done in the preceding article. Besides this, they will be found related in all the histories of the time. From the accounts of his military transactions, it is evident that his character and abilities, as a warrior, were very great; and yet they have not assumed, in the eye of posterity, that splendour which might justly have been expected from them. The fact is, that his glory has been shaded by the superior lustre of Cromwell, with whom he acted.

Lord Fairfax's dispatches, letters, and other papers which he had occasion to write in the course of his employments, may be seen at large in the Parliamentary History. To enter into a detail of them would carry us to a great length, and would not be interesting to the generality of our readers. Those who are desirous of full information on the subject may have recourse to the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th, volumes of the history now mentioned.

In a paper extracted from an original manuscript by Dr. Bryan Fairfax, and inserted in the Annual Register, are some circumstances relating to the latter part of Lord Fairfax's life. He was afflicted with the gout and stone, the pains of which he endured with a courage and patience, equal to what he had shewn in his warlike exploits. These disorders were the result of the wounds he had suffered, and the fatigues he had gone through, during the war. The gout took from him the use of his legs, and confined him to a chair, in which he sat like an old Roman, his manly countenance striking awe and reverence into all that beheld him; while it was mixed with as much modesty and sweetness as were ever represented in the figure of mortal man. Most of his time was spent in religious duties, and a great part of the remainder in reading valuable books, for which he was well qualified by his skill in modern languages. His death was occasioned by a fever, which carried him off in a few days. The last morning of his life, he called for a bible, saying, "his eyes grew dim," and read the forty-second psalm (71).

(71) Annual Register, for the year 1773, Vol. XVI. Second Part, p. 76, 77.

Mrs. Macaulay, speaking of Lord Fairfax's resignation of his command, as General, has the following observations: 'The friends of royalty have preposterously supposed that Fairfax, contrary to his sentiments and principles, had allowed the army to offer violence to the parliament, and to put their sovereign to death. But such supposition (though in some measure authorized by his own confession in the memoirs of his military actions, published under the auspices and direction of his son-in-law the Duke of Buckingham, when Fairfax had turned courtier to Charles the Second) is contrary to the equal tenor of his conduct during the whole civil contention, and to the following account which his contemporaries give of his character: that though in debate he was slow in delivering his opinions, and patient in attending to those of others, yet after, on mature deliberation, he had fixed his judgment, he adhered to it with an unsurmountable integrity. Fairfax, though a Presbyterian, was, both in civil and religious subjects, infinitely more liberal in his sentiments than the generality of that sect. He had no objection to the form of a republick, provided the spirit of it was free, and that it was administered with justice; nor to toleration in religion, provided the established forms were Presbyterian. At this time, somewhat disgusted at the entire exclusion of that party out of the civil and religious government of the country, urged by the importunities of an impetuous imperious wife, who was a narrow-minded Calvinists, and governed by Priests, tender of violating the public faith, and angry with the compliment, which the Parliament, at his expence, had paid to Cromwell, he, in a discontented sullen mood, unfortunately dispossessed himself of that power which, whilst in such equitable hands, must have preserved the infant state of liberty from falling a sacrifice to the greedy and corrupt designs of its less-virtuous partizans (72).'

(72) Macaulay's History of England, Vol. V. p. 52—55. Octavo Edition.

The character of Lord Fairfax is drawn by Mr. Hume with a concise but masterly hand. 'Fairfax,' says this historian, 'was a person equally eminent for 'courage and for humanity; and, though strongly 'infected with prejudices, or principles derived from 'religious and party zeal, he seems never, in the 'course of his public conduct, to have been diverted, 'by private interest or ambition, from adhering strictly 'to these principles. Sincere in his professions; disinterested in his views; open in his conduct; he had 'formed one of the most shining characters of the age, 'had not the extreme narrowness of his genius, in 'every thing but in war, and his embarrassed and confused elocution on every occasion but when he gave 'orders, diminished the lustre of his merit, and 'rendered the part which he acted, even when vested 'with the supreme command, but secondary and 'subordinate (73).'

(73) Hume's History of Great Britain, Vol. VII. p. 29. Octavo Edition of 1789.

Lord Fairfax has found a place, not to his advantage, in Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of noble authors. Of his Lordship's "Short Memorials" it is observed that one can easily believe his having been the tool of Cromwell, when one sees by his own memoirs how little idea he had of what he had been about. 'But 'his Lordship,' adds Mr. Walpole, 'was not only an 'historian, but a poet. In Mr. Thoresby's Museum 'were preserved in manuscript the following pieces; "The Psalms of David," "The Song of Solomon," "The Canticles," and "Songs of Moses, Exod. 15. "and Deut. 32." and other parts of Scripture versified." "Poem on Solitude." Besides which, in the 'same collection were preserved "Notes of Sermons 'by his Lordship, by his Lady, and by their daughter 'Mary;" and "A Treatise on the Shortness of 'Life." But, of all Lord Fairfax's works, by far the 'most remarkable were some verses which he wrote 'on the horse on which Charles the Second rode to 'his coronation, and which had been bred and presented to the King by his Lordship. How must 'that merry monarch, not apt to keep his countenance on more serious occasions, have smiled at this 'awkward homage from the old victorious hero of 'republicanism and the covenant (74)!'

(74) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, Vol. II. p. 223-225.

If Lord Fairfax makes but an indifferent figure as an author, his memory is respectable as a lover and encourager of literature. This is properly taken notice of by our predecessor; and, in the same view, we have had occasion to speak of his Lordship, in what is said concerning Roger Dodsworth, at the close of our addition to the Life of Dugdale. Mr. Warton has added his testimony to Lord Fairfax's character in this respect. It is as follows: 'He gave twenty-nine 'ancient manuscripts to the Bodleian library, one of 'which is a beautiful manuscript of Gower's Confessio 'Amantis. When the Record-Tower in St. Mary's 'Abbey at York was accidentally blown up in the 'grand rebellion, he offered rewards to the soldiers 'who could bring him fragments of the scattered 'parchments. Luckily, however, the numerous 'original evidences lodged in this repository had 'been just before transcribed by Roger Dodsworth; 'and the transcripts, which formed the ground-work 'of Dugdale's Monasticon, consisting of forty-nine 'large folio volumes, were bequeathed by Fairfax to 'the same library. Fairfax also, when Oxford was 'garrisoned by the parliamentary forces, exerted his 'utmost diligence in preserving the Bodleian library 'from pillage; so that it suffered much less than 'when that city was in possession of the Royalists '(75).'  [FANSHAWE

 [FANSHAWE* (the Right Hon. Sir RICHARD, Knt. and Bart.) a Stateſman, Negotiator, and Poet, of the laſt century, was the youngeſt ſon, and tenth child, of Sir Henry Fanſhawe [A], Knt. Remembrancer of the Exchequer, and brother of Lord Viſcount Fanſhawe, of Dromore, in the kingdom of Ireland, and was born at Ware-Park in Hertfordſhire, in the month of June, 1608 (a). Being only ſeven years of age when his father died (b), the care of his education devolved upon his mother, who placed him under the famous ſchoolmaſter, Thomas Farnaby. November 12, 1623, he was admitted a Fellow-Commoner of Jeſus College, Cambridge, under the tuition of Dr. Beale, where he proſecuted his ſtudies with ſucceſs, and diſcovered a genius for claſſical learning. Thence he was removed to the Inner-Temple, Jan. 22, 1626; but at his mother's death he reſolved to purſue a line of life better adapted to his genius and inclination, and accordingly he travelled to France and Spain, for the purpoſe of acquiring the languages, and ſtudying the manners of thoſe countries. On his return home, he was appointed Secretary to the Embaſſy at Madrid, under Lord Aſton, and was left reſident there from the time of Lord Aſton's reſignation to the appointment of Sir Arthur Hopton in 1638 (d).

Being in England at the breaking-out of the civil war, he declared early for the crown, and was employed in ſeveral important matters of ſtate. In 1644, attending the Court at Oxford, he had the degree of Doctor of Civil Law conferred upon him (e), and was appointed Secretary at War to the Prince of Wales, whom he attended into the weſtern parts of England, and thence into the iſlands of Scilly and Jerſey (f). In 1648, he was appointed Treaſurer to the Navy under Prince Rupert, which office he managed till the year 1650, when he was created a Baronet, and ſent to Madrid to repreſent the neceſſitous ſituation of his maſter, and to beg a temporary aſſiſtance from Philip the Fourth. He was then ſent for to Scotland, and ſerved there in the capacity of Secretary of State to the great ſatisfaction of all parties, although he took neither covenant nor engagement [B]: about this time he was recommended by the King to the York party, who received him with great kindneſs, and entruſted him with the broad ſeal and ſignet. In 1651, he was taken priſoner at the battle of Worceſter, and committed to cloſe cuſtody in London; but, having contracted a dangerous ſickneſs, he had liberty allowed him, upon giving bail, to go for the recovery of his health to any place he ſhould chuſe, provided he ſtirred not five miles thence without leave from the Parliament. In 1654, he was at Tankerſley Park in Yorkſhire, which place he hired of his friend Lord Strafford, to whom he dedicated his tranſlation of the "Luçiad of Camoëns," made during his reſidence there. In February, 1659, (under pretence of travelling abroad with the eldeſt ſon of Philip Earl of Pembroke), he obtained his bail to be returned, and repaired to King Charles II. at Breda, who knighted him in April following; and appointed him Maſter of Requeſts, and Secretary of the Latin Tongue (g).

Upon his Majeſty's reſtoration, he expected to be appointed Secretary of State, from a promiſe which had formerly been made him of that office [C]; but to his great diſappointment, it was, at the inſtance of the Duke of Albemarle, given to Sir William Morrice (h).

He was elected one of the Repreſentatives of the Univerſity of Cambridge [D] in the Parliament which met the 8th of May, 1661, and was ſoon after ſworn a Privy Counſellor of Ireland. Having by his reſidence in foreign Courts, qualified himſelf for public employments abroad, he was ſent Envoy Extraordinary to Portugal, with a

Sir Henry was twice married—By Mary Bouchier, his firſt wife, he had Thomas, created Viſcount Fanſhawe, of Dromore; Sir Simon; and Sir Richard, our author. dormant commiſſion to the Ambaſſador, which he was to make uſe of as occaſion ſhould require. Shortly after, he was appointed Ambaſſador to that Court, where he negotiated the marriage between his maſter King Charles II. and the Infanta Donna Catharina, daughter of King John VI. and returned to England towards the end of the ſame year. It appears that he was again ſent Ambaſſador to that Crown in 1662, and was, upon his return to England, the following year (i), ſworn of his Majeſty's Privy-Council(k). His integrity, abilities, and induſtry, became ſo well known in Portugal, that he was recommended and deſired by that Crown to be ſent to Spain as the fitteſt perſon to bring about an accommodation between Spain and Portugal (l). In the beginning of the year 1664, he was ſent Ambaſſador to Philip IV. King of Spain [E], and arrived, February the 29th, at Cadiz, where he was ſaluted in a manner unexampled to others, and received with ſeveral circumſtances of particular eſteem(m) [F]. During his reſidence at this Court, he experienced ſuch frequent mortifications as Miniſters uſe to meet with in Courts irreſolute and perplexed in their own affairs, and had made a journey to Liſbon upon the earneſt deſire of Spain, and returned without effect. On a ſudden, when the recovery of Philip IV. grew deſperate, a project for a treaty was ſent to the Ambaſſador, containing more advantages of trade to the nation (which are the moſt important matters in all treaties), and inſiſting upon fewer inconvenient conditions than had ever been in any of the former, and urging the immediate acceptation or rejection of it, on account of the King's illneſs, "which," they declared, "might make ſuch an alteration in Counſels, that, if it were not done in his life-time, "they knew not what might happen after." The Ambaſſador, ſurpriſed with this overture, compared what was offered with what he was to demand by his inſtructions, and what was defective in thoſe particulars he added to the articles preſented to him, with ſuch farther additions, as, upon his own obſervation and conference with the merchants, occurred to him; which, being agreed to, he ſigned the treaty (n), with a ſecret article reſpecting Portugal, and ſent it to England. The treaty was no ſooner brought to the King, and peruſed in Council, but many faults were found with it, and in the end the King concluded that he would not ſign it; and thereupon the Ambaſſador was recalled (o) [G].

Sir

[E] In the beginning of the year 1664, he was ſent Ambaſſador to Philip IV. King of Spain.] His correſpondence during this embaſſy was publiſhed in 1701, in one volume, 8vo under this title. 'Original Letters 'of his Excellency Sir Richard Fanſhawe during his 'Embaſſy in Spain and Portugal; which, together 'with divers Letters and Anſwers from the chief 'Miniſters of State in England, Spain, and Portugal, 'contain the whole Negotiations of the treaty of peace 'between thoſe three crowns.' The publiſher received theſe letters from the hands of a daughter of Sir Richard, who had them in her poſſeſſion. In Sir Richard's inſtructions, the chief points recommended to him were, to demand ſeparation and puniſhment from ſome free-booters, who had taken ſhips from the Engliſh, and to endeavour to reſtore amity, trade, and commerce, and renew the alliance between England and Spain: to mediate an accommodation between Spain and Portugal: to get the exportation of blacks into the Weſt-Indies appropriated to the Engliſh; and the preſcription of Spaniſh wools, &c.

[F] And received with ſeveral circumſtances of particular eſteem.] It appears from one of Sir Richard's letters, that this extraordinary reſpect was paid him not only upon his own but alſo upon his maſter the King of England's account. His words are thus: 'I had not been three hours on ſhore (at Cadiz) 'when an extraordinary meſſenger arrived from 'Madrid, with more particular orders than formerly 'from his Catholic Majeſty, importing that our 'maſter's fleet, when arrived, and his ambaſſador, 'ſhould be pre-ſaluted from the city in a manner unexampled to others, and which ſhould not be drawn 'into example hereafter. Moreover (and this ſo 'likewiſe) that I and all my company muſt be totally 'defrayed, both here and all the way up to Madrid, 'upon his Catholic Majeſty's account; with ſeveral 'other circumſtances of particular eſteem for our 'royal maſter, above all the world beſide.' From a paſſage in another letter of his it is evident, that the hope the Spaniards entertained, of having Tangier and Jamaica reſtored to them by England, was, 'that 'which made his arrival impatiently longed for, and 'ſo magnificently celebrated.'

[G] And thereupon the Ambaſſador was recalled.] Lady Fanſhawe's account is as follows: 'The articles 'concluded on between England and Spain by Sir 'Richard Fanſhawe, and the articles for the adjuſtment between Spain and Portugal, were cavilled at 'by Lord Chancellor Clarendon and his party, that 'they might have an opportunity to ſend the Earl of 'Sandwich out of the way from the Parliament which 'then ſat, as he and his friends feared he would be 'ſeverely puniſhed for his cowardice in the Dutch 'fight. He neither underſtood the cuſtoms of the 'Court, nor the language, nor indeed any thing but 'a vicious life; and thus was he ſhuffled into Sir 'Richard's employment, to reap the benefit of his 'five years negotiation of the peace of England, 'Spain, and Portugal, and after above thirty years 'ſtudying ſtate affairs, and many of them in the 'Spaniſh Court. So much are ambaſſadors ſlaves to 'the public miniſters at home, who often through 'ignorance or envy ruin them!' The letter which he wrote to Charles II. on this occaſion is amongſt the Harl. MSS. in the Muſeum, No. 7010.

Madrid, Thurſday 3d June, 1666. St. Loci.

'By the hands of my Lord of Sandwich, who 'arrived in this Court upon Friday laſt, was delivered 'to me a letter of revocation from your Majeſty, 'directed to the Queen Regent, and at the ſame time 'another, with which your Majeſty honoured me for 'myſelf, implying the principal (if not the only) 'motive of the former to have been, ſome exceptions 'that had been made relative to the papers which I 'ſigned with the Duke of Medinas de los Torres, 'upon the 17th of December laſt paſt; a conſideration ſufficient to have utterly caſt down a ſoul leſs 'ſenſible than hath ever been mine of your Majeſty's 'leaſt ſhow of diſpleaſure, though not accompanied 'with other puniſhments, if your Majeſty (according 'to the accuſtomed tenderneſs of your Royal diſpoſition, in which you excel all Monarchs living), to 'comfort an old ſervant, had not yourſelf broken the 'blow in the deſcent, by this gracious expreſſion in 'the ſame letter: "that I may aſſure myſelf your 'Majeſty believes I proceeded in the articles ſigned by 'me,

Sir Richard was preparing for his return to England; when, June 4, 1666, he was ſeized at Madrid with a violent fever which put an end to his life the 16th of the ſame month, the very day he had deſigned to ſet out on his return home (p). His body, being embalmed, was conveyed by his lady, with all his children then living, by land to Calais, and ſo to London; whence being carried to All Saints Church in Hertford, it was depoſited in the vault of his father-in-law, Sir John Harriſon, till May 18, 1671, when it was removed into a new vault, made on purpoſe for him and his family in the pariſh-church of Ware. Near the vault there is a handſome monument erected to his memory (q) [H]. He was remarkable for his meekneſs, ſincerity, humanity, and piety; and alſo was an able ſtateſman and a great ſcholar, being in particular a complete maſter of ſeveral modern languages, eſpecially Spaniſh, which was perfectly familiar to him.

'In obedience to your Majeſty's letter abovemen-'tioned, I make account, God willing, to be upon 'my way towards England ſome time next month, 'having in the interim performed to my Lord Sand-'wich (as I hope I ſhall to his full ſatisfaction) thoſe 'offices which your Majeſty commands me in the 'ſame, whoſe royal perſon, councils, and under-'takings, God Almighty preſerve and proſper many 'years; the daily fervent prayers of

They were tranſlated by our author in 1654, during his confinement at Tankerſley-Park, in Yorkſhire; which uneaſy ſituation induced him to write the following ſtanzas on this work.

Time was, when I, a pilgrim of the ſeas;
When I, 'midſt noiſe of camps and court's diſeaſe,
Purloin'd ſome hours to charm rude cares with verſe,
Which flame of faithful ſhepherd did rehearſe.

But now, reſtrain'd from ſea, from camp, from court,
And by a tempeſt blown into a port,
I raiſe my thoughts to muſe on higher things,
And echo arms and loves of Queens and Kings.

Which Queens (deſpiſing crowns and Hymen's band)
Would neither man obey, nor man command;
Great pleaſure from rough ſeas to ſee the ſhore;
Or from firm land to hear the billows roar.

He compoſed ſeveral other things, which he had not leiſure to complete: even ſome of the beforementioned printed pieces have not all the perfection which our ingenious author could have given them; but that is not the caſe with his excellent tranſlation of Paſtor Fido, which was publiſhed by himſelf, and hath been applauded by ſome of the beſt judges, particularly by Sir John Denham, in a poem beginning with the following celebrated diſtich (7).

"Leſs honour to create than to redeem.
"That ſervile path thou nobly doſt decline
"Of tracing word by word, and line by line."

And concludes the encomium in this maſterly deſcription of the freedom of his tranſlation.

[K] Anne, eldeſt daughter of Sir John Harriſon of Balls.] She was the daughter of Sir John Harriſon by Margaret his wife, daughter of Robert Fanſhawe, of Fanſhawe-Gate, Eſq. great uncle to Sir Richard, to whom ſhe was married in Wolvercot church, near Oxford, 18 May, 1644. She compiled, for the uſe of her only ſon, "Memoirs of the Fanſhawe "Family," containing a particular account of their ſufferings in the royal cauſe, in which ſhe and her ſiſter Margaret Harriſon (who, in 1654, married Sir Edmund Turnor, of Stoke-Rochford, co. Lincoln, Knt.) bore a conſiderable ſhare, being the conſtant companions of Sir Richard in thoſe perilous times. The deſcription of her and her huſband's taking leave of Charles I. when he was a priſoner at Hampton-Court, is very affecting, and is told with great ſimplicity. 'During the King's ſtay at Hampton-Court, I 'went three times to pay my duty to him, both as I 'was the daughter of his ſervant, and the wife of his 'ſervant; the laſt time I ever ſaw him I could not 'refrain from weeping. When I took my leave of 'the King, he ſaluted me, and I prayed God to pre-'ſerve his Majeſty with long life and happy years. 'The King ſtroked me on the cheek, and ſaid, "Child, 'if God pleaſeth it ſhall be ſo, but both you and I 'muſt ſubmit to God's will; and you know in what 'hands I am in." Then turning to my huſband he 'ſaid, "Be ſure, Dick, to tell my ſon all that I have 'ſaid, and deliver theſe letters to my wife. Pray 'God bleſs her; and I hope I ſhall do well." Then 'taking my huſband in his arms, he ſaid, "Thou 'haſt ever been an honeſt man; I hope God will 'bleſs thee, and make thee a happy ſervant to my 'ſon, whom I have charged in my letter to continue 'his love and truſt to you;" adding, "And I do 'promiſe you, if I am ever reſtored to my dignity, I 'will bountifully reward you both for your ſervices 'and ſufferings"—Thus did we part from that glori-'ous ſun, that within a few months afterwards was 'extinguiſhed, to the grief of all Chriſtians, who are 'not forſaken of their God.'

Theſe memoirs, from the variety of intereſting matter they contain, might, if they were publiſhed, prove an acceptable preſent to the public. The excellent writer of them was no leſs diſtinguiſhed for her ſtrength of mind and courage than for her piety and virtue. When the veſſel that carried her from Ireland to Spain was attacked, ſhe put on men's clothes, and fought with the ſailors (8).

 [FARMER (Hugh), a learned Divine among the Proteſtant Diſſenters, was born in the year 1714. The place of his birth was a village near Shrewſbury, where his parents reſided, and where they lived in much eſteem, being perſons of diſtinguiſhed piety and virtue. His deſcent was from very reſpectable and religious anceſtors in North Wales. The Reverend Hugh Owen, of Bronyclydwr, in Merionethſhire, an eminent character among the ejected Miniſters of the principality, and of whom an honourable account is given by Dr. Calamy, was our author's grandfather. Mr. Farmer, being early deſigned for the Chriſtian Miniſtry, received the firſt part of his grammatical learning in a ſchool, at that time of conſiderable reputation, in Llanegrin, near Towyn, Merionethſhire, and which had been founded by two of his progenitors. From this place he was ſent to perfect his claſſical education under the tuition of Dr. Owen, of Warrington, a gentleman whom we have had occaſion to mention with reſpect in the 309th page of our preſent volume. It was, we apprehend, in 1730, that Mr. Farmer began his academical ſtudies at Northampton, under the care of Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Philip Doddridge. He was one of the Doctor's earlieſt pupils; and we need not ſay that he muſt have rendered himſelf conſpicuous by his abilities, application, and improvements. Dr. Doddridge was ſenſible of the honour he was likely to derive from ſuch a ſtudent; and, though he did not live to ſee the eminence which he attained in the literary world, always ſpoke of him in terms of high reſpect (a). After Mr. Farmer had finiſhed his academical courſe, he became chaplain to William Coward, Eſq. of Waltham-Stowe, Eſſex, and preacher in a meeting-houſe which had been lately erected by that gentleman, whoſe name is of great note among the Diſſenters, on account of the large bequeſts which he made for the education of young men for the miniſtry, and for other beneficent purpoſes. Mr. Coward was remarkable for the peculiarities and oddities of his temper; and in this reſpect many pleaſant ſtories are related concerning him. Amongſt his other whimſies, his houſe was ſhut up at an uncommonly early hour, we believe at ſix in the winter, and ſeven in the ſummer; and whoever, whether a viſitant or a ſtated reſident, treſpaſſed upon the time, was denied admiſſion. Mr. Farmer having one evening been ſomewhat too late, was of courſe excluded. In this exigence he had recourſe to a neighbouring family, and it was one of the moſt fortunate circumſtances of his life. Indeed, it conſtitutes the principal epocha of his perſonal hiſtory. The houſe in which he took refuge was that of William Snell, Eſq. a Solicitor of the higheſt reputation for his abilities and integrity; and of whom no greater encomium needs to be given than that he lived in habits of intimacy and friendſhip with the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, Sir John Strange, and others of the firſt eminence, in that day, at the bar and on the bench. In this worthy family Mr. Farmer continued more than thirty years, during the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Snell, by whom he was treated more like an equal than an inferior. Here he enjoyed a long ſeries of peaceful leiſure, which he employed in collecting a large fund of ſacred and profane literature, intended to be produced in the defence and illuſtration of natural and revealed Religion (b). At the ſame time, he was peculiarly diligent, and peculiarly acceptable as a preacher. His congregatiou, which, when he accepted the paſtoral charge of it, was very ſmall, gradually increaſed in number and in character; ſo that it became one of the moſt wealthy diſſenting ſocieties in or near the City of London. The writer of this article well remembers its having been attended with between thirty and forty coaches.

Mr. Farmer's firſt appearance as an author was in a diſcourſe on the ſuppreſſion of the Rebellion of 1745. It was preached on the day of public thankſgiving appointed upon that occaſion in 1746, and printed in the ſame year. This was the only ſermon that we recollect his having ever committed to the preſs. His abilities, though they might eminently have been displayed in that way, led him to higher exertions in literature. In 1761, he published "An Enquiry into the Nature and Design of Christ's "Temptation in the Wilderness[A];" the general intention of which is to shew, that this part of the evangelical history is not only to be understood as a recital of visionary representations, but that the whole was a divine vision, premonitory of the labours and offices of our Lord's future ministry. An interpretation, so new and singular, could not pass unnoticed. In 1762, there appeared a pamphlet against the Enquiry, entituled, "Christ's Temptations, real Facts: or, a Defence of the Evangelic History; shewing "that our Lord's Temptations may be fairly and reasonably understood as a Narrative "of what was really transacted." As we do not recollect that we ever read this performance, we cannot speak of it with precision. By the critics it was characterized as abounding more in learning than in judgment (c). A second edition of Mr. Farmer's treatise was soon called for; in which the subject received additional illustration from a considerable number of new notes. Besides this, our author published, in 1764, an appendix to the "Enquiry," containing some farther observations on the point in debate, and an answer to objections. Another tract, the publication of which was occasioned by the "Enquiry," was entituled, "The Sovereignty of the Divine Administration vindicated, or a rational Account of our blessed Saviour's remarkable Temptation in the Wilderness; the Possessed at Capernaum, the Demoniacs at Gadara, and "the Destruction of the Swine: with free Remarks on several other important Passages in the New Testament." This was a posthumous piece, which had been written before Mr. Farmer's work appeared, by Mr. Dixon, who had been a Dissenting Minister, first at Norwich, and afterwards at Bolton in Lancashire. Mr. Dixon proposes a figurative or allegorical interpretation of our Lord's temptation. His opinion is, that the devil was not at all concerned in it; but that such thoughts arose in the

(c) Monthly Review, Vol. XXVII. p. 78.

[A] Of Christ's temptation in the wilderness.] Before our author attempts to settle the true nature and design of our Saviour's temptation, he considers what objections lie against the several explications that have hitherto been given of this part of the New Testament history. It has commonly been understood as a narrative of real facts. The devil, it is supposed, tempted Christ in person, appeared to him in a visible form, spoke to him in an audible voice, and removed him corporeally from one place to author. But this opinion Mr. Farmer thinks to be liable to various objections. The principal objections to it are, that it is unsuitable to the sagacity and policy of the evil spirit; that it is very ill-calculated to promote either the honour of Christ or the instruction and consolation of his disciples; that it ascribes to the devil the performance of the greatest miracles, and of things not only preter-natural, but absurd and impossible; and that the text itself, instead of positively and expressly asserting, that the temptation of Christ was a real outward transaction, contains clear intimations, if not direct assertions, of the very contrary. Some writers there are, who, allowing that this part of the evangelical history is to be understood as a recital of visionary representations, contend, that these visions were framed by the devil, and that the temptations are to be ascribed to his immediate agency. This interpretation our author acknowledges to have one advantage above the former, that it does not destroy the uniformity of the history, nor represent the Evangelists as blending together, indiscriminately, ideal and real objects. But, in all other respects, he endeavours to prove, that it is liable to equal or even greater difficulties than the former. Having considered the objections that may be raised against the two different explications of our Saviour's temptations which have commonly prevailed, Mr. Farmer proceeds to enquire whether the text itself does not lead to a very different interpretation; whether it does not represent the temptation of Christ as befalling him while he was under a prophetic vision, of which the Spirit of God himself was the immediate and sole author. That the temptation is to be regarded in this light, he thinks may be fairly argued from the express letter of the text, and from several circumstances in the narrative; and in the proof of his position, whether he be finally successful or not, he certainly displays great critical skill and ingenuity. As it was in vision only that Christ was removed from place to place, so it was in the same manner, likewise, that he was tempted by the devil. But it may be asked, if he was tempted while under the power of a divine vision, why is it said that he was led up into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil? and why is the devil described as coming to him, and tempting him accordingly, and taking him from one place to another, just in the same manner as if he had been really present, and actually done these things? Mr. Farmer answers, that in a vision the images of things appear, and not the objects themselves; and, therefore, that the devil was not really and personally present with Christ, but only in mental representation; and consequently that he could act no part in the whole transaction. But, though there was no real presence or agency of Satan upon the occasion, yet was his image now placed before the imagination of Christ, and he seemed to him to say and do all that is ascribed to him in the history; which was, in effect, the same thing, with regard to Christ, as if this had been the very case. Hence the history affirms, that the devil did all these things; and the Evangelists, in thus expressing themselves, have used no other language than what it was to be expected they would use; no other than what was common on all such occasions.

With respect to the proper intention of this prophetic vision, our author labours to prove, that the several scenes which it contains, though presented to Christ in the form, and capable of answering the end, of a present trial, were principally designed as a symbolical prediction and representation of the future difficulties of his office and ministry. Having prepared the way for the proof of this proposition, by premising some general observations, he proceeds to examine the several scenes of the vision, in order to point out the peculiar intention of each, and to shew how well they were adapted to the purpose in view. Each scene, while it contained the proposal of a present and urgent temptation, was a symbolical prediction and representation of such trials as our Lord was to undergo in the course of his future ministry. Mr. Farmer endeavours farther to evince, that there was a peculiar propriety in the season at which the vision took place. The "Enquiry" is concluded with the three following observations: That the account given of Christ's temptation obviates all the objections made to the common interpretation, and justifies the wisdom of God in this dispensation; that it exalts the character of Christ, and confirms our Faith in his divine mission; and that it affords ample consolation and instruction to his disciples, under the manifold and great temptations with which they may be called out to struggle (1).

mind of our Saviour as would naturally have ariſen in the mind of any perſon in the ſame or like circumſtances with thoſe in which Chriſt then was. The editor, Mr. Seddon, of Warrington, thinks that Mr. Dixon's notion of an allegorical repreſentation of real temptations is preferable to an entire viſionary ſcene; and aſks, "is it not "more honourable to our Lord, and more exemplary (d)?" Not again to reſume the preſent ſubject, we ſhall here take notice, that a third edition of Mr. Farmer's "Enquiry" was publiſhed in 1776. This impreſſion contains large additions, more eſpecially in the third ſection. What our author has principally in view is to confirm, by new arguments, his explication of "Chriſt's being brought into a Wilderneſs by or "in the Spirit (e)."

The "Enquiry" was only a prelude to the more important deſigns which Mr. Farmer had in view. In 1771, he publiſhed "A Diſſertation on Miracles, deſigned to "ſhew, that they are Arguments of a divine Interpoſition, and abſolute Proofs of the "Miſſion and Doctrine of a Prophet," octavo. As this is our author's prime compoſition, and very curious in its kind; as, likewiſe, it is become very ſcarce, and is not likely ſoon, if ever, to be reprinted, we ſhall inſert below a full account of it, which was drawn up at the time by the writer of the preſent article [B]. Not long after the appearance

[B] Which was drawn up at the time by the writer of the preſent article.] So great a number of learned and elaborate treatiſes have been written upon miracles, that many of our readers will be diſpoſed to conſider the ſubject as entirely exhauſted, or will imagine, at leaſt, that nothing farther can be ſaid upon it that is very neceſſary or important. But, the perſons who form this opinion, will, we believe, upon a diligent examination of the matter, find themſelves to be miſtaken. Indeed, the notion, that it is ſcarcely poſſible to advance any thing which is new, is a falſe one, with regard almoſt to every object of knowledge and ſcience. The continued cultivation of human reaſon, and a free and accurate diſcuſſion of nice and difficult queſtions, cannot fail either of producing freſh diſcoveries, or of ſetting what is already known in a clearer and more ſtriking point of view. Even the multitude of books, that have been publiſhed on a ſubject, may render a farther enquiry into it extremely deſirable and uſeful, in order to diſentangle it from the errors which have been mixed with it, and to bring men back to the ſimplicity of truth.

This is particularly the caſe with reſpect to miracles. Were we to conſult the natural dictates of the underſtanding, we could ſcarcely doubt but that miracles muſt proceed from God alone, and that they are deciſive teſtimonies of the divine authority of the perſons by whom they are wrought. Theſe plain and obvious principles have, however, been ſtrangely obſcured and perverted, not only by the ſubtleties of ſcepticiſm, but by the falſe reaſonings, and abſurd ſuppoſitions, of Chriſtian writers. Divines of the greateſt eminence, and who in other reſpects have done ſignal ſervice to the intereſts of Revelation, have fallen into conſiderable miſtakes in relation to the true nature and deſign of miracles, and eſpecially with regard to the beings who have been ſuppoſed capable of performing them. It became, therefore, highly neceſſary to re-examine the ſubject; to clear it from the embarraſſments in which it has been involved; and to place it in that juſt and proper point of light in which it is exhibited by the genuine dictates of reaſon, and the concurrent repreſentations of ſcripture. This hath been done, in a very ſatisfactory manner, in the ingenious and learned work before us, which we ſcruple not to pronounce to be one of thoſe ſubſtantial and durable treatiſes that will always be conſidered as a valuable and important acquiſition to the cauſe of ſacred literature.

"What is attempted," ſays Mr. Farmer, "in the "following ſheets, is, to refute thoſe principles of "demoniſm, which have done ſo much diſcredit to "the argument drawn from miracles in favour of the "Jewiſh and Chriſtian revelations. Without entering "into an examination of the peculiar nature and circumſtances of the ſcripture miracles, I conſider "only the general queſtion, Whether miracles are, in "themſelves, evidences of a divine interpoſition, and "conſequently (when properly applied) certain "proofs of the divine original of a ſupernatural revelation? Nor is it merely the credit of revelation "that is concerned in this queſtion, but the honour "alſo of the general adminiſtration of divine providence, and the common intereſts of piety and "virtue."

The performance opens with ſome preliminary conſiderations; in the firſt ſection of which the nature of miracles is explained, and ſhewn to conſiſt in their contrariety to thoſe general rules by which the viſible world is governed, or to the common courſe of events in it.

"That the viſible world," ſays our Author, "is "governed by ſtated general rules, commonly called "the laws of nature; or that there is an order of "cauſes and effects eſtabliſhed in every part of the "ſyſtem of nature, ſo far as it falls under our obſervation, is a point which none can controvert. "Effects produced by the regular operation of the "laws of nature, or that are conformable to its eſtabliſhed courſe, are called natural. Effects, contrary "to this ſettled conſtitution and courſe of things, I "eſteem miraculous. Were the conſtant motion of "the planets to be ſuſpended, or a dead man to return "to life, each of theſe would be a miracle, becauſe "repugnant to thoſe general rules by which this "world is governed at all other times.

"All miracles ſuppoſe an eſtabliſhed ſyſtem of "nature, within the limits of which they operate, and "with the order of which they diſagree. The creation of the world at firſt, therefore, though an im"mediate effect of divine omnipotence, would not "come under this denomination. It was different "from, but not contrary to, that courſe of nature, "which had not hitherto taken place. And miracles "may be ſaid to diſagree with, or to be contrary to, "the general rules and order of the natural ſyſtem, "not only when they change the former qualities of "any of the conſtituent parts of nature (as when "water, for example, is converted into wine) or when "they controul their uſual operation and effects, (as "when fire, without loſing its properties, does not "burn combuſtible materials, or a river is divided in "its courſe, the water ſtill preſerving its gravity,) but "alſo when they ſuperſede (as they always do) the "uſual operation of natural cauſes. For, effects produced in the pre-eſtabliſhed ſyſtem of nature, without the aſſiſtance of natural cauſes, are manifeſt "variations from, or contradictions to, the order and "uſual courſe of things in that ſyſtem. That a man "ſhould be enabled to ſpeak a new language, which "he never learnt in a natural way, and that his body "ſhould be ſupported without food, are events evidently contrary to the ordinary courſe of things, and "to that conſtitution of divine providence which renders mankind dependent upon their own ſtudy and "application for the knowledge of languages, and "upon food for ſuſtenance. We do not aſſirm, that "miracles do univerſally and neceſſarily imply a pro-appearance of the "Diſſertation," a notion was propagated, that Mr. Farmer had made

"per ſuſpenſion of the laws of the natural world, ſo "as that they ſhould ceaſe to produce their uſual "effects: the human mind may receive new know-"ledge in a ſupernatural manner, without any ſuſ-"penſion of its preſent powers. Nevertheleſs, the "ſupernatural communication of new knowledge to "the human mind, is contrary to the general rules by "which the human ſyſtem is governed, or to that con-"nection which God has eſtabliſhed between our ac-"quiſition of knowledge and the proper exerciſe of "our rational faculties."

After clearing this account from objections, Mr. Farmer goes on to obſerve, that moſt writers, in defining a miracle, ſeem to place it, not in the effect produced, but in the cauſe, or at leaſt include the latter in their definition.

"A miraculous effect, like every common appearance, "has its own proper ſpecific nature, diſtinguiſhing it "from all others of a different kind, ſeparate from the "conſideration of its cauſe. And it is the operation, "or effect, alone, which is affirmed to be contrary to "that eſtabliſhed order and diſpoſition of things, "commonly called the courſe of nature: the real in-"viſible agent by whom the effect is produced, though "he acts out of his uſual ſphere, exerts only his natural "powers. The contrariety or conformity of the event "itſelf to thoſe laws by which this world is governed "in the courſe of God's general providence, is that "alone which denominates and conſtitutes it a proper "miracle or not."

From the deſcription which our Author has given of the nature of miracles, he draws four concluſions; the third of which is as follows:

"Before we can pronounce with certainty any ef-"fect to be a true miracle, it is neceſſary—that the "common courſe of nature be in ſome degree firſt un-"derſtood. In all thoſe caſes in which we are igno-"rant of nature, it is impoſſible to determine what is "or is not a deviation from it, or to diſtinguiſh be-"tween miracles and natural effects. Even a real "miracle cannot be admitted as ſuch, or carry any con-"viction, to thoſe who are not aſſured that the event is "contradictory to the courſe of nature. On the other "hand, in all caſes in which the courſe of nature is un-"derſtood, it will be eaſy to determine whether any "particular event be contrary or conformable to it, "that is, whether it be a real miracle. Miracles "therefore are not, what ſome repreſent them, ap-"peals to our ignorance: they ſuppoſe ſome antece-"dent knowledge of nature, without which, it is "owned, no proper judgment can be formed con-"cerning them; though, with it, their reality may "be ſo apparent as to prevent all diſpute or heſitation. "Every ſenſible deviation from, or contradiction to, the "known laws of nature, muſt be an evident and incon-"teſtible miracle."

The deſign of the ſecond ſection of the firſt chapter, is to prove, that miracles are not impoſſible to the power of God; that they are not neceſſarily repugnant to our ideas of his wiſdom and immutability; and that they do not imply any inconſiſtency in the divine conduct, or any defect or diſturbance of the laws of nature. In ſhewing that miracles are not repugnant to our ideas of the divine wiſdom the writer obſerves, that frequent miraculous interpoſitions might, indeed, argue a defect in thoſe general laws by which the world is governed; to the regular execution of which laws we owe our ideas of order and harmony, our rational expectations of ſucceſs in all our undertakings, and our ſtrongeſt convictions of wiſe counſel in the frame and government of the univerſe.

"Conſequently," ſays he, "it muſt appear highly "improbable, that variations from thoſe laws ſhould "take place, unleſs upon ſome ſpecial and urgent occa-"ſions. Yet, whoever reflects on the boundleſs extent "and duration of the divine government will eaſily "perceive that nothing can be more abſurd, as well as "arrogant, than for man, a creature whoſe faculties "are ſo limited, and who is but of yeſterday, to pre-"ſume to determine that no fit occaſion for extraordi-"nary interpoſals can ever occur in that adminiſtra-"tion, the plan of which tranſcends his comprehen-"ſion. By what principles of reaſon can it be "demonſtrated, that he, who reigns from eternity, "never formed any deſigns except ſuch as may be "accompliſhed by the preſent eſtabliſhment and "ſtructure of the univerſe?—It would be difficult to "prove that God may not, in certain circumſtances, "have greater reaſons for varying from his ſtated rules "of acting than for adhering to them. And, when-"ever this is the caſe, and the end propoſed is pro-"portionable to the means of accompliſhing it, the "miracles are worthy of a divine interpoſition."

In the third and laſt ſection of the preliminary conſiderations, Mr. Farmer examines into the different cauſes to which miracles have been aſcribed; and, at the concluſion of the chapter, ſets before his readers the following view of his own ſcheme, and the point he hath undertaken to eſtabliſh.

"It will now, perhaps, be enquired, "If miracles "are neither the effects of natural cauſes, nor of ſu-"perior created intelligence, acting from themſelves "alone; and if it cannot be proved that they do uni-"verſally and neceſſarily require the exertion of infi-"nite power, to what cauſe they are to be aſcribed?" "I anſwer they are always to be aſcribed to a divine "interpoſition: by which I mean, that they are never "wrought but either immediately by God himſelf, or "by ſuch other beings as he commiſſions and em-"powers to perform them. Miracles may not require "a degree of power abſolutely incommunicable to any "created agent; and yet God may never actually "communicate a miraculous power to any creature, or "do it only where he directly authorizes its uſe. Now "whether God works the miracles himſelf alone, or "whether he enables and commiſſions others to work "them, there is equally a divine interpoſition: and "in either caſe every purpoſe of religion will be ſe-"cured; for, whatever God authoriſes and empowers "another to do is, in effect, done by God, and is "as manifeſtly a declaration of his will as what he "does immediately himſelf. He can no more autho-"riſe another to act than he can himſelf act in op-"poſition to his own nature, or in confirmation of "impoſture.

"The point then which I ſhall undertake to eſta-"bliſh, is this, "that miracles are the peculiar "works of God, or ſuch as can never be effected "without a divine interpoſition, in the ſenſe of the "phraſe already explained." This point we ſhall "endeavour to eſtabliſh both by reaſon and revela-"tion. And, ſhould we ſucceed in this attempt, "there will then be no difficulty in ſhewing that mi-"racles are, in themſelves, certain proofs of the di-"vinity of the miſſion and doctrine of the performer, "and the moſt effectual methods of recommending "him to the regard of mankind."

The ſecond chapter contains the arguments that may be drawn from reaſon, to prove that miracles are never effected without a divine interpoſition; and, in the firſt ſection of this chapter, it is ſhewn that the ſame conſiderations, which manifeſt the exiſtence of ſuperior created intelligences, do much more ſtrongly conclude againſt their acting out of their proper ſphere. From the diverſity of creatures, and the gradual aſcent from the loweſt to the higheſt order of exiſtence obſervable here on earth, it has been inferred, that the ſcale of beings is continued upwards above man, and that there are numberleſs ſpecies of creatures ſuperior to him, as we know there are of ſuch as are inferior to him. This reaſoning, according to our author, has not, perhaps, all that force in it, which its having been uncontroverted might lead us to ſuppoſe. Should it, however, be granted, that the ſcale of beings in our planet is a concluſive proof, not only of a like gradation of beings elſewhere, but alſo of there being in the univerſe creatures as much ſuperior to man as man is of the meaneſt reptile; ſtill, he obſerves, the ſame kind of reaſoning, which proves there are ſuch beings, proves, at the ſame time, that they have a certain limited ſphere of action

tion appointed them by God. For, how various ſoever the powers of different ſpecies of creatures here on earth may be, they are all under particular laws, and have bounds circumſcribed to their activity, which they are not able to tranſgreſs: and the rule of analogy teaches us to conclude the ſame concerning all other beings.

"If we may judge of the conduct of Providence in "unknown inſtances by thoſe which fall under our "obſervation, HE, who has ſet bounds to the Sea, "which it cannot paſs, and ſays to its proud waves, "Hitherto ſhall you come, but no farther, has bounded "the power, and fixed the ſtate of all the creatures "which he hath made, not excepting thoſe of the "nobleſt order. And therefore whatever their natu"ral powers may be, and however freely they may "be allowed to uſe them, they are limited and de"termined to ſuch purpoſes as God has appointed, "and cannot poſſibly be extended beyond the ſphere "aſſigned them by the Creator. And yet, no ſooner "is it proved (or thought to be ſo) that probably there "are, in ſome portion of the univerſe, beings ſupe"rior to man, than it ſeems to be taken for granted, "that they have the liberty of an unbounded range "over the whole creation, and their influence extends "over this earthly globe, in particular, and that they "ſtand in the ſame relation to man as man himſelf "does to inferior creatures. But, though there be a "ſtrict connexion between the different orders of "creatures on this earth, who all belong to the ſame "ſyſtem, yet none of them have any poſſible com"munication from this lower world with the inhabi"tants of different ſyſtems; none of them are able "to traverſe the univerſe, or to paſs the bounds of "their proper dwelling. And this muſt be the caſe "in other ſyſtems, ſuppoſing them to be regulated by "the ſame laws which take place in our own. Their "inhabitants may have larger capacities than man"kind, and a wider province aſſigned them, and yet "have no more power over us than we have over "them; they may have no communication with us, "nor any influence beyond the limits of their own "globe.

"If," continues Mr. Farmer, "we wave the ar"gument from what is called the ſcale of being, and "appeal to the unbounded power and goodneſs of "God, or to the aſtoniſhing magnificence of the "univerſe, in proof of the exiſtence of creatures of a "higher order than man: ſtill theſe arguments, how"ever concluſive, will not prove that they are not "under the continual government and controul of "God, or that they have not all their proper depart"ment: for, not to allege that the power and good"neſs of God, though ſtrictly infinite, and though they "have (without doubt) diſplayed themſelves in the "production of more noble orders of beings than "mankind, are not, however, exerted to the utmoſt "in every, or in any, ſingle effect, it is certain they "are never exerciſed but under the direction of un"erring wiſdom, by which all things are framed in "the moſt exact proportions: and, as to the univerſe, "it is no leſs diſtinguiſhed by its perfect order and "harmony than by its grandeur and extent. To "what purpoſe then is it to plead, that we know not "what degrees of power God may have communicated "to created beings? Can it be ſhewn that they are "ſubject to no laws, that their influence is unconfined, "and reaches to all the ſyſtems of the univerſe?"

It is the opinion of that juſtly celebrated writer, Dr. Clarke, that, to deny created ſpirits the natural power of working miracles, is ſaying, they have no power naturally to do any thing at all. But our author obſerves, that Dr. Clarke's reaſoning proceeds upon theſe two principles, that ſuperior natures have the ſame ſphere of action aſſigned them with thoſe inferior to them, and that they enjoy the very ſame powers and privileges

"The former of theſe, ſays he, is deſtitute of "proof, and the latter is contradicted by the wiſe or"der and œconomy of Providence. Has man the "ſtrength or ſwiftneſs of brute animals? Can he fly "in the air, or dive into the ocean? How much "ſoever man may excel the brutes, he has not the "ſame organs and powers of action, and his opera"tions muſt therefore be quite different from theirs. "The ſame may be true of angels compared with "men. Their capacities may be more noble than "ours, and they may move in a much more exalted "ſphere, without being able to do every thing which "man is capable of doing. The conſideration of "their poſſeſſing powers ſuperior to mankind, will "not create any proof, or even the loweſt degree of "preſumption, that they have any power over this "earthly globe, or are capable of diſturbing the laws "by which it is governed."

Should it be ſaid, "that allowing that ſuperior "created beings have only a limited ſphere of action "aſſigned them; yet how does it appear that this "lower world itſelf is not their appointed ſphere, and "that they have not a power of interpoſing to work "miracles upon this earthly globe?"

To this queſtion an anſwer is given at large in the next ſection, in which it is ſhewn that there is no proper evidence of the truth of any miracles but ſuch as might have God for their author. The ſuppoſition of the power of any created agent to work miracles, in this lower world, without a divine commiſſion, is contradicted by the obſervation and experience of all ages; there being, in fact, no proper evidence of the truth of any miracles, but ſuch as may fitly be aſcribed to the Deity. All the facts appealed to, in proof of the miraculous agency of evil ſpirits, are either not ſupernatural or not real. Several general reaſons are likewiſe alleged for rejecting all miracles that could not have God for their author; after which, Mr. Farmer adds the following obſervations:

"Now," ſays he, "if there be no ſufficient rea"ſon to believe that any ſuperior ſpirits, acting "without the order of God, have ever, from the "beginning of the world to this day, performed a "ſingle miracle upon our earthly globe, how void of "all foundation muſt be the aſcribing to them a "miraculous power! Were they poſſeſſed of ſuch a "power, it is natural to ſuppoſe they would have ex"erted it frequently, eſpecially as it may ſo eaſily be "made ſubſervient to the purpoſes of malevolence "and impiety. What miſeries of every kind might "not wicked ſpirits, from a principle of envy and "hatred, introduce amongſt mankind! And, if good "ſpirits enjoyed an equal liberty of doing good offices "to men, what a theatre of contention would our "globe have been between ſpirits of ſuch oppoſite "diſpoſitions and deſigns! And, therefore, if, in a "long ſucceſſion of ages, there has been no appear"ance of any ſuch conteſt between virtuous and "wicked ſpirits; if no motives whatever have ex"cited the one or the other to exert a miraculous "power, ſo much as once, is it not a natural infe"rence that they do not poſſeſs it? With regard to "God, indeed, reaſon informs us, that he, who eſta"bliſhed the courſe of nature, can change it at plea"ſure, even whether he has already done ſo or not. "But the caſe is different as to other beings, whoſe "powers and operations are only to be known in a "natural way, by obſervation and experience. God "is manifeſt in every part of nature: but who can "point out the effects of other ſpirits, and their ope"rations on the univerſe? And, if we ſee no effects of "their agency on this earthly globe, if no ſuch "effects have ever been ſeen, there can be no ground "from reaſon to aſcribe it to them, it is as repug"nant to the obſervation and experience of all ages, "to aſcribe to evil ſpirits a miraculous power, as it is "to aſcribe life to the inanimate, or ſpeech to the "brute creation."

In the third and fourth ſections of the ſecond chapter, Mr. Farmer endeavours to prove that, as the laws of nature are ordained by God, and eſſential to the order and happineſs of the world, it is impoſſible he ſhould delegate to any of his creatures a power of working miracles, by which thoſe divine eſtabliſhledging it; and it was asserted, that his book had the very same view with Mr. Le Moine's, establishments may be superseded and controul'ed, and that the ascribing such a power to any superior beings besides God, and those immediately commissioned by him, subverts the foundation of natural piety, and is a fruitful source of idolatry and superstition. He concludes the fourth section as follows:

"Most melancholy is it to reflect how much the "general principle we are here opposing viz. the "power of Satan to work miracles, and the various "superstitions grounded upon it, have contributed, "in all ages, and in all nations, to the disquiet and "corruption of the human race, and to the extinc- "tion of rational piety. This consideration alone, "were there no other, should check the zeal of Chris- "tians to maintain an opinion—so destructive to our "virtue and happiness, and which the wisest "Heathens, from principles of benevolence and "piety, earnestly wished and laboured to extir- "pate.

"In a word, if we entertain just and honourable "sentiments of the constitution of the universe, and "its all-wise and benevolent Author, can we believe "that he has subjected us to the pleasure and dispo- "sal of superior beings, many of whom are supposed "to be as capricious and malevolent as they are "powerful? Has God put our very life, and the "whole happiness of it, into such hands? This some "maintain he does; and this he must have done, if he "has granted them the power of working miracles at "pleasure: an opinion which cannot fail to rivet "Heathens in their idolatry, and Christians in the "most detestable superstitions."

The intention of the fifth section is to shew, that, if miracles were performed in favour of false doctrines, mankind would be exposed to frequent and unavoidable delusion.

"If," says our Author, after some previous remarks, "miracles, by their own natural influence, "are calculated to procure immediate credit to the "doctrine they attest; if they constitute an evidence "adapted to the common sense and feelings of man- "kind; if they make an impression which scarce any "resistance can totally prevent or efface; it is an easy "and obvious inference from hence, that, if they "were performed in favour of false doctrines, the "generality of mankind would be necessarily exposed "to frequent delusion: and those would be the least "able to resist the impression of miracles, who had "the strongest sense of God upon their minds, the "most honourable apprehensions of his natural and "moral government, and were the most fearful of "incurring his displeasure, by rejecting any revela- "tion of his will.

"Here it will be objected, 'That, if miracles were "wrought to confirm falsehood, the nature of the "doctrine might serve to guard us against being de- "ceived, and direct us to ascribe the works to some "evil agent, who was permitted to perform them for "the trial of mankind.' In answer to this objection, "it might perhaps be sufficient to observe, that what "some call God's permitting would be in reality "empowering and commissioning evil spirits to work "miracles. For, God's removal of the restraint or "disability which those spirits are under at all "other times, amounts to his giving them both a "power and a commission to work miracles on this "particular occasion. And this God cannot do in "confirmation of falsehood.

"But, much stress being laid on this objection, we "will offer some farther observations upon it. The "most arbitrary and unnatural suppositions, when "they have been long made, are thought at last to "have some foundation to support them, and require "the same notice to be taken of them as if they had. "It is not true, in fact, that any miracles have ever "been performed in support of error, on purpose to "try our faith: at least, no sufficient evidence ap- "pears of the truth of any such miracles; nor do the "ends of the divine government seem to require that "mankind should be exposed to this particular trial.

"The temptations which occur in the ordinary course "of Providence, are abundantly sufficient to exercise "our virtue; and it is quite needless that miracles "should be wrought, merely to put it to a farther "proof. Now, if reason cannot shew that mankind "ought to be, and experience convinces us that they "never have been, exposed to the delusion of false "doctrines inforced by miracles, the notion that they "may be so must be considered as a mere fiction. "Besides, how unlike would such a trial be to those "ordained by God! The latter arise from passions "planted in our nature for the most valuable purposes, "and from the most useful and necessary relations of "life. But our adversaries suppose miracles may be "atchieved with no other view than as mere matter of "trial to mankind, which is repugnant to all our "knowledge of the divine dispensations. Not to "observe, that errors, inforced by miracles, would, "very frequently at least, constitute a trial rather of "the understanding than of the heart; and, in this "respect likewise, it would differ from those to "which God has subjected mankind.

"To convince us more fully that no miracles can "ever accompany a false doctrine, merely for the "trial of mankind, I would observe, that they are "not capable of answering this end, upon the prin- "ciples of those by whom it is assigned. Were a false "doctrine to be attested by miracles, it must be "asserted, either that the falsehood of it was discerned, "or that it was not. If the falsehood of the doctrine "was discerned, and it was at the same time known "that the miracles attesting it might and must be "performed by some evil agent; in this case, where "would be the trial? The miracles, it would be "allowed, were no evidence of the truth or divinity "of the doctrine, and contained no recommendation "of it, or motive to embrace it; nay, they could "only serve to furnish an invincible prejudice against "it, on account of the known malevolence of their "author. If, on the other hand, the falsehood of the "doctrine was not, and could not be discerned, the "miracles attending it being considered only as proofs "of the interposition of some superior being, the "mind must be thrown into a state of perplexity and "suspence about the author of the works, and re- "main void of all inducement either to embrace or "reject the doctrine. And, consequently, here also "there would be no trial at all. We are never more "in danger of charging God foolishly than when "we judge of him, not by what he has done, but "by what we presume it becomes him to do. It "might convince us how little a way bare speculation "can carry us in all researches into the nature and "government of God, to find the strongest minds, "when trusting to speculation alone, ascribing to him "unworthy measures, and inventing designs and ends "for them, which they are not adapted to answer. "The very scheme which assigns the trial of mankind, "as the end of God's permitting miracles to be per- "formed, in confirmation of error, does itself shew it "could not be promoted by them. Now, whoever "calls upon us to believe, that miracles may be "wrought without any necessity, and even without "any use, demands our assent to what contradicts all "our ideas of divine wisdom, and the whole course "of the divine dispensations, as well as the several "reasons before urged to shew that no variations from "the established laws of Nature can take place, except "when they are indispensably necessary to promote "the most important purposes of God's administra- "tion."

After offering several other arguments to prove that God cannot subject mankind to the delusion they would necessarily be exposed to, if miracles were wrought in favour of false doctrines, Mr. Farmer comes to the sixth and last section of the second chapter; the business of which is to evince, that, if miracles may be performed without a divine interposition, and in support of falsehood, they cannot be authentic credentials of a divine mission, and criterions of truth. There are two cases in which miracles are conſidered as evidence of a divine miſſion, by ſome who plead that ſuch works may, on other occaſions, be performed without the order of God. It is urged, firſt, "That in caſe of a conteſt between two oppoſite parties, working miracles for a victory, the party which works the moſt and greateſt miracles may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to be aſſiſted by the Supreme Being;" and, ſecondly, "That ſuch miracles only are to be aſcribed to God as are performed for an end not unworthy of him." It is clearly ſhewn, by our learned writer, that theſe two ſuppoſitions by no means remove the difficulty; and we ſhall preſent our Readers with part of what he has advanced concerning the judging of miracles by the doctrine.

"It is neceſſary," ſays he, "to obſerve farther, "that the making the doctrine the teſt of the divinity "of miracles, is, to make the doctrine the rule of "judging concerning the miracle, not the miracle "the rule of judging concerning the doctrine. The "proper and immediate deſign of miracles is, to "eſtabliſh ſome truth unknown before, and ſuch as is "not demonſtrable by reaſon, or capable of other evi-"dence beſides that of miracles; to prove, for ex-"ample, the miſſion of the prophet by whom they "are performed, and the divine original of his meſ-"ſage or doctrine, and to engage them to receive and "comply with it, however contrary it may be to their "prejudices and paſſions. But, according to ſome "learned men, the doctrine muſt firſt be examined "without paſſion or prejudice, and then employed to "prove the divinity of the miracles. But is not this "repugnant to the proper uſe and intention of mira-"cles? It is making the whole force of the proof to "depend upon the doctrine to be proved. It is of "importance to add, that miracles are intended more "eſpecially for the conviction of the ignorant and "unlearned, who are eaſily impoſed upon by the "ſophiſtry of ſcience, and the ſpecious diſguiſes of "error, as well as utterly diſqualified to determine, by "abſtract reaſonings, concerning the abſolute neceſ-"ſity, or the fitneſs and propriety of ſpecial divine "interpoſitions. It is neceſſary therefore that mira-"cles, when they are offered as evidences of a divine "commiſſion, ſhould contain in their own nature a "clear demonſtrative proof of their divine original: "for, otherwiſe, their ſpecial deſign could not be an-"ſwered. It is quite unnatural to ſuppoſe, that the "doctrine muſt firſt eſtabliſh the divinity of the mira-"cles, before the miracles can atteſt the divinity of "the doctrine; and it is abſurd to expect that a new "revelation and offenſive truths (which are not re-"ceived without reluctance, even where there is a "prior conviction of the divinity of the miracles at-"teſting them) ſhould themſelves effectually engage "men to aſcribe thoſe works to God which might be "performed by numberleſs other inviſible agents.

"Now, can it be imagined that God will ever "allow ſuperior beings to work miracles in ſupport "of falſehood, if hereby he would deſtroy the proof "from theſe works of his own immediate interpoſi-"tion, and put it out of his own power to employ "them as certain credentials of a divine miſſion? "Miracles (under which term I comprehend thoſe "of knowledge as well as power) being the only means "whereby God can aſſure the world of the truth of a "new revelation, he muſt have reſerved the uſe of it to "himſelf alone, without ever parting with it to ſerve "the purpoſe of his rivals and oppoſers."

We come now to the principal part of Mr. Farmer's performance, the deſign of which is to ſhew that the ſcriptures, both of the Old and the New Teſtament, ſtrictly correſponding with right reaſon, always repreſent miracles as the peculiar works of God; and never attribute them to any other beings, unleſs when acting by his immediate commiſſion. This ſubject is conſidered in its full extent, and our Author is neceſſarily led by it into a variety of learned and critical enquiries, which we could not abridge, or give a ſufficient account of, without extending the preſent article to an improper length. We muſt, therefore, in many caſes, content ourſelves with barely noticing what has been done; referring our readers to the work itſelf for more ample ſatisfaction and entertaiment.

The firſt ſection of the third chapter conſiders the view which the ſcripture gives us of angels, both good and evil, and of the ſouls of departed men; and is deſigned to ſhew that this view of them is inconſiſtent with their liberty of working miracles. As to good angels, they are never repreſented as capable of performing miracles at their own pleaſure. Of whatever dignity, they are only miniſtring ſpirits, the ſervants of Jehovah, doing his commandment, and hearkening to the voice of his word, without having themſelves any power over mankind, or over thoſe laws by which the ſyſtem to which we belong is governed. Now, if this be the caſe with regard to good angels, what reaſon can there be for aſcribing ſuch dominion to evil angels, who are fallen under the divine diſpleaſure? The ſcripture never aſcribes to the devil the ability of revealing ſecrets, foretelling future events, or working miracles; never guards mankind againſt being deceived by the outward effects either of his miraculous power or inſpiration, neceſſary as ſuch a caution would have been, had he been able to inſpire prophecies and work miracles; and earneſtly as it warns us againſt a leſs danger, the pretences of men to divine miracles and inſpiration, when they were not ſent and aſſiſted by God. It has, indeed, been ſuppoſed, from Dan. x. 13, 20, and Epheſ. ii. 2, that fallen angels preſide over diſtant regions of the world, and that they have a power of changing the conſtitution of the air; but it is proved by Mr. Farmer that no ſuch doctrine can be reaſonably grounded on theſe paſſages. He has ſhewn, likewiſe, that the ſouls of deceaſed men have no intercourſe with the material creation, at leaſt, not with this lower world; that the idea entertained of them by Chriſtians, both in ancient and modern times, has been borrowed from the Pagans; and that the miracles aſcribed to departed ſaints are branded as impoſtures by St. Paul.

The next ſection contains an accurate and curious enquiry into the repreſentation which the ſcripture affords of the nature and claims of the Heathen divinities. Our author here ſhews, that the Heathens deified all the parts and powers of nature, and that they believed the exiſtence of demons, who were conſidered as the diſtributors or diſpenſers of good and evil to mankind. It was the opinion of many, that the celeſtial gods did not themſelves interpoſe in human affairs, but committed the entire adminiſtration of the government of this lower world to theſe ſubaltern deities; and hence theſe ſubaltern deities became the grand objects of the religious hopes and fears of the Pagans, of immediate dependence and divine worſhip. As it has often been ſaid, that the demons of the Heathens were ſpirits of a higher origin than the race of man, Mr. Farmer enters into an examination of the reaſons commonly aſſigned for this notion; and has endeavoured to prove, by the teſtimony of the ancient hiſtorians, poets, and philoſophers, and by uncontroverted facts, that the more direct objects of Pagan worſhip were ſuch departed human ſouls as were believed to become demons. After this he goes on to confirm the ſame point from the authority of the Old-Teſtament writers; conſiders the uſe of the word demon in the Septuagint tranſlation, in Philo, in Joſephus, and in the New Teſtament; introduces ſome remarks on the late controverſy between Dr. Sykes and his antagoniſts; and refers us to the evidence both of Heathens and Jews, to ſhew that the ſpirits of wicked men were thought to become wicked demons. The opinions of the Chriſtian Fathers upon the ſubject are alſo particularly conſidered, and then our Author proceeds to the following important obſervations.

"If

vindicate himſelf, in a pamphlet, publiſhed in 1772, and entituled, "An Examination of

"If the foregoing account of the Pagan gods be "juſt, there will be no difficulty in vindicating the "cenſures paſt upon them in the ſacred writings. "With regard to the parts and powers of nature, "which the Heathen world deified, they are repre- "ſented in ſcripture as the creatures of God's power, "and the paſſive inſtruments of his decrees. Even the "ſun, and the moon, and the ſtars, and all the hoſt of "heaven, however revered by the Pagans as the chief "deities, the Iſraelites are forbidden to worſhip and "ſerve, becauſe Jehovah, their God, placed them in the "firmament of heaven; not for the uſe of any one "particular nation, but for the common benefit of the "whole human race. It is extraordinary that Moſes, "at a time when the world was univerſally regarded "as animated and divine, and the elements and the "heavenly bodies were thought to poſſeſs an internal "power to exert themſelves in all their admirable "effects; it is very extraordinary that Moſes, at this "time, ſhou'd diſcover, publiſh, and (by ſuitable "miracles) confirm, the oppoſite doctrine. His doc- "trine is perfectly agreeable to the modern philoſo- "phy, which repreſents the whole natural world as a "merely material, inert, inactive, thing, without any "wiſdom or power of its own, and reſiſting any "change of ſtate, whether of reſt or motion; and "which muſt therefore be continually upheld and "directed by the power of God, to whom the whole "train of natural cauſes and effects is to be aſcribed. "This doctrine alone of Moſes, ſo remote from the "ſentiments and philoſophy of his age, and ſo agree- "able to truth, creates a ſtrong preſumption of his "having received it by immediate revelation.

"As to the other gods of Paganiſm, whether they "were ſuch human ſouls as became demons, or (as "ſome apprehend) created ſpirits of a ſuperior order, "we have already ſeen that the ſcripture gives ſuch a "view of them, as is inconſiſtent either with their in- "ſpiring prophecies or working miracles. And it will "be ſhewn in the ſequel that all ſupernatural effects "are referred to God alone by the ſacred writers. Is "it poſſible for them to contradict themſelves, as they "muſt do, if they aſcribe ſuch effects to the Heathen "gods? But ſo far are they from doing this, that they "conſtantly repreſent thoſe gods as utterly impotent "and inſignificant; either as having no real exiſt- "ence, or no more power than if they did not exiſt. "They call them vanities, things of no kind of "value or efficacy. Nor is this cenſure confined to a "part only of the Heathen gods: it is extended to all, "without a ſingle exception. They are ALL vanity. "ALL the gods of the nations are idols, or nothings: not "powerful evil ſpirits, but mere nullities. In this "manner the ancient prophets of God ſpoke of the "Pagan deities; and the apoſtles of Chriſt uſed the "ſame language: we know that an idol is nothing in "the world. This is not to be underſtood of the mere "images of the gods: for, the Heathens did not re- "gard thoſe images, in themſelves conſidered, as real "gods. They believed them to be the repreſentatives "and the receptacles of their gods, and in this view "they ſpoke of them as gods, and the objects of "divine worſhip, and it is in reference to the divine "powers ſuppoſed to reſide in them, that the ſcriptures "affirm, that they are nothing. On all occaſions the "ſacred writers deride theſe pretended reſidences of "the Heathen deities as mere earthly materials, "poliſhed by the hand of the artificer, and the deities "themſelves as equally void of underſtanding, or "rather as being nothing diſtinct from thoſe ſenſeleſs "materials, and exiſting only in the imagination of "their deluded worſhippers. The ſtock is a doctrine of "vanities. Their idols are ſilver and gold, or wood and "ſtone, the work of mens hands, which neither ſee nor "hear, nor eat, nor ſmell. Agreeably hereto the "ſcripture repreſents the votaries of theſe divinities "as perſons utterly loſt to reaſon, and without a "ſhadow of excuſe. They are altogether brutiſh and "fooliſh, and diſcover no more underſtanding than the "idols they make.

"Oracles, prophecies, prodigies, were aſcribed by "the Heathens to their demons, and on their favour "the good or evil ſtate of men's lives was thought to "depend. This perſuaſion was the ground of their "worſhip: and the proper point in diſpute between "idolaters and the prophets of the true God was, "whether that perſuaſion was ſupported by facts. "We find the meſſengers of God challenging idola- "ters to juſtify the worſhip of idols, and the idol "gods themſelves to give proof of their divinity, by "a diſplay of knowledge, or by ſome exertion of "power, ſuch as was either hurtful or beneficial to "mankind: and, even admitting that, by ſuch a diſ- "play of their power or knowledge, the Heathen "deities would have eſtabliſhed their claim to divinity "and their title to the homage of mankind. Produce "your cauſe, ſaith the Lord, bring forth your ſtrong "reaſons. Let them ſhew the former things what they "be, that we may conſider them, and know the latter "end of them: produce your ancient oracles, that we "may judge whether they were fulfilled by corre- "ſpondent events; or, now declare to us things for to "come. Shew us things for to come hereafter, that we "may know that ye are gods; yea, do good, or do evil, "that we may be diſmayed: that it may appear ye have, "what your votaries aſſert, a title to the reverence "and worſhip of mankind. Behold, ye are nothing, "and your work of nought, and therefore there can be "no ſhadow of reaſon for paying you homage. How "very different is this language of the ancient pro- "phets from that of our learned moderns, who tell "us, that idolatry cannot poſſibly be juſtified by any "miracles, however numerous or ſplendid; and that, "whatever power over mankind the Heathen gods "might poſſeſs, they could have no right to worſhip. "The prophets would have allowed their title to "worſhip, had they admitted their power. Their "utter impotence is the only reaſon of the ſcripture's "remonſtrating againſt paying them homage. I add, "that theſe remonſtrances of ſcripture, which are "frequently repeated, are confirmed by facts, by "many ſtriking teſtimonies of the utter inability of "the Heathen deities to interpoſe either for the con- "viction of gainſayers, or for the benefit of their "worſhippers, or in vindication of their own honour. "They could not interpret Nebuchadnezzar's dream, "nor the hand-writing upon the wall of Belſhazzar's "palace; nor were they able to anſwer by fire, in the "public trial between their own prophet and the "prophet of Jehovah, though, on theſe ſeveral occa- "ſions, but eſpecially the laſt, all their credit was "at ſtake. Nor did they oppoſe (how much ſoever "it might be their intereſt to do it) any miracles of "their own to theſe either of Moſes or the Meſſiah, "as we hope to ſhew in the ſequel."

In oppoſition to all this evidence, it has been aſſerted, that the ſyſtem of Pagan idolatry was ſup- ported by prophecies and miracles, delivered and performed, not by the fictitious deities of the Heathens, but by devils, or wicked demons of a higher order than mankind. It has been farther aſſerted, that theſe wicked ſpirits were, properly ſpeaking, the gods of the Heathens, rather than thoſe imaginary beings, whom they ſeemed to them- ſelves to worſhip; and, in ſupport of theſe aſſertions, appeal is made to the writings of the Fathers, and the authority of ſcripture. It muſt be owned, that theſe extravagant opinions are clearly contained in the writings of the Fathers; but they are only aſ- ſerted there, not proved, and perhaps were never really believed by the very perſons who maintained them, and upon whoſe authority alone they have been received in ſucceeding ages. As, however, it is a matter of no great importance what ſentiments the Fathers entertained on the ſubject, Mr. Farmer (in addition to the general reaſons he had already ſuggeſted) makes it is buſineſs to prove, that the ſcripture never repreſents the Heathens as worſhip- ping devils, and conſiders the meaning of the ſeveral words

" of the late Rev. Mr. Le Moine's Treatiſe on Miracles;" in which he enters into a particular words rendered devils in the Old Teſtament, and the ſignification of demons in the New.

Our Author examines, in the third ſection, the character and pretenſions of the magicians, diviners, and ſorcerers of antiquity; lays before his readers the ſcripture account of them; and refutes the various pleas alleged by Chriſtians in ſupport of the credit and efficacy of the ancient magic. The magicians undertook to interpret dreams, to foretel future events, and to accompliſh many wonderful things, by their ſuperior knowledge of the ſecret powers of nature, of the virtues of plants and minerals, and of the motions and influences of the ſtars. Divination was a ſcience in which they thought themſelves ſure of ſucceſs, if they proceeded according to certain eſtabliſhed rules. Nor are we hence to infer, as ſome have done, that the ancient magicians, or prieſts, were mere naturaliſts and aſtrologers. There have, indeed, been Atheiſts and Chriſtians, who have been much addicted to divination and aſtrology; but theſe arts among the Pagan nations were founded in their ſyſtem of theology. The ſcripture, however, without paying regard to the principles the magicians went upon or the different characters they aſſumed, brands them all as ſhameleſs impoſtors, and reproaches them with an utter inability of diſcovering or accompliſhing any thing ſupernatural. The prophet Iſaiah, having foretold the deſtruction of Babylon, ſo famous all over the world for divination and aſtrology, thus proceeds to inſult that proud city: Stand now with thine enchantments, and with the multitude of thy ſorceries, wherein thou haſt laboured from thy youth; if ſo be thou ſhalt be able to profit, if ſo be thou mayſt prevail. Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counſels. Let now the aſtrologers, the ſtar-gazers, the monthly prognoſticators, ſtand up, and ſave thee from thoſe things which ſhall come upon thee, from that deſtruction, which, he tells them, with their various methods of divination and ſorcery, they would be unable either to foreſee or prevent.

But, notwithſtanding the clear deciſion of the point by the divine oracles, many Chriſtians have contended for the ſupernatural power and efficacy of Pagan divination and ſorcery. This point was maintained by the Fathers in particular, who aſcribed the efficacy of magic to evil demons; as ſome of the Heathen philoſophers alſo did. It was a very prevailing opinion in the primitive church, that magicians and necromancers, both among the Gentiles and heretical Chriſtians, had each their particular demons, perpetually attending on their perſons, and obſequious to their commands, by whoſe help they could call up the ſouls of the dead, foretel future events, and perform miracles. Mr. Farmer, therefore, in farther oppoſition to theſe ſentiments, proceeds to ſhew, that the ſupernatural power of magic cannot be inferred, either from the ſcripture's deſcribing diviners by their uſual appellations, or as having a familiar ſpirit, and a ſpirit of divination; nor from the laws of Moſes againſt divination and witchcraft; nor from the credit in which theſe arts were ſaid to be held. Indeed, this credit was not ſo great as hath ſometimes been repreſented; for, it appears, from many paſſages and teſtimonies of ancient writers, that magic and divination were treated with general contempt in enlightened ages.

In the fourth ſection, which relates to the falſe prophets as ſpoken of in ſcripture, are explained, 1. The celebrated warning of Moſes, Deut. xiii. 1—5. 2. The prophecy of Chriſt, Matth. xxiv. 24. 3. Several paſſages in the Epiſtles, with regard to the falſe teachers in the apoſtolic age. 4. St. Paul's prophecy concerning the Man of Sin, whoſe coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and ſigns, and lying wonders. And, 5. St. John's prediction concerning the perſon, who was to do great ſigns, and make fire come down from heaven. Part of what is ſaid upon our Saviour's prediction, There ſhall ariſe falſe Chriſt's, and falſe prophets, and ſhall ſhew great ſigns and wonders, cannot be unacceptable to our Readers.

" Our Lord is not here warning his diſciples " againſt admitting the divinity of unqueſtionable " miracles, but againſt haſtily crediting the truth of " thoſe pretences to miracles, which would be made " by the perſons of whom he is ſpeaking. This ap- " pears, as well from the natural import of this pro- " phecy in its original language as from the hiſtory " and character of the impoſtors to whom it refers. " Chriſt does not ſay, 'Falſe prophets ſhall ſhew, that " is, really exhibit and perform, great ſigns,' but (as " the original word ſhould have been rendered) " they " will GIVE, that is, appeal to, promiſe, or undertake, " to produce ſuch ſigns, uſing the very language of " the Jewiſh legiſlator explained above, who repre- " ſents a prophet as giving (that is, propoſing and ap- " pealing to) a ſign or wonder, whether it did or did " not come to paſs. The phraſe itſelf does not de- " termine whether the ſign given be it the promiſe " of a miracle, or the prediction of an event, would " be confirmed or confuted, when it was expected to " be accompliſhed. It might be engaged for, and " yet never be exhibited. And every circumſtance " of the prophecy contained in this context ſerves to " prove, that the perſons here foretold would only " undertake to ſhew great ſigns, without performing " what they undertook. But I ſhall argue chiefly " from the hiſtory of thoſe perſons, in whoſe appear- " ance and pretenſions this prophecy received its " completion, and which muſt be allowed to be the " beſt key to the interpretation of this prophetic " warning.

" Our Saviour here refers to thoſe impoſtors, who " ſprang up in Judea in the interval between the " delivery of this prophecy, and the deſtruction of " Jeruſalem. As early as the 45th or 46th year of " the Chriſtian æra, one Theudas, who called him- " ſelf a prophet, perſuaded great numbers to follow " him to Jordan, by telling them that he would, by " his own command, divide the river: but this con- " fident boaſt ended in his own deſtruction as well " as that of many of his followers. About nine or " ten years afterwards, Judea ſwarmed with theſe de- " ceivers, who led the people into the wilderneſs, " and undertook to exhibit divine wonders. One who " came out of Egypt promiſed to cauſe the walls of " Jeruſalem to fall down; but the deluded multitudes " who followed him were diſperſed or deſtroyed by " the Romans, ſuffering (to uſe the language of Joſe- " phus) the puniſhment of their folly. The nearer the " Jews were to deſtruction, ſo much the more did " theſe impoſtors multiply, and ſo much the more " eaſy credit did they find with thoſe who were willing " to have their miſeries ſoothed by hope. Even " during the conflagration of the Temple, a falſe " prophet encouraged the people with miraculous " ſigns of deliverance: nor did the total deſtruction of " the city cure this madneſs, as appears by the conduct " of an impoſtor at Cyrene, who promiſed to ſhew them " ſigns and apparitions."

The fifth ſection is employed in proving, that the ſcriptures repreſent the one true God as the ſole creator and ſovereign of the world, which he governs by fixed and invariable laws; and that to him they appropriate all miracles, urging them as demonſtrations of his divinity and ſole dominion over nature, in oppoſition to the claims of all other ſuperior beings.

" How very different a view of miracles is this," ſays our author, after having fully eſtabliſhed his point, " from that given us by thoſe learned " moderns who aſſert, that they argue only the inter- " poſition of ſome power more than human; that the " loweſt orders of ſuperior intelligences may perform " great miracles, and higher orders of beings greater " miracles ſtill; that no miracle recorded in " ſcripture can be pronounced beyond the power of " all created beings in the univerſe to produce; and " that in no caſe whatever can the immediate inter- " poſition

" position of God be distinguished certainly by the " works themselves? When the adversaries of revela- " tion use such language, with a view to destroy its " evidence, they speak in character. But what raises " our wonder is, its being held by some of its ablest " votaries and advocates, notwithstanding that revé- " lation strongly asserts the sole dominion of Jehovah " over Nature, and every deviation from the laws of " Nature (that is, every miracle,) to be in itself a " demonstration of his being its Creator and Lord. " Which of these two opinions is most consonant to " reason is a point discussed in the second chapter. " We only observe here, that they cannot both be " true. Can those works be the sole prerogatives of " Jehovah, and a proof of his sole and unrivalled " sovereignty, which others besides him, and even " when acting in opposition to him, have a power of " performing as well as he? And can we successfully " maintain the argument from miracles in favour of " revelation, if we do not adhere to the use which " revelation itself makes of miracles?"

As the most able of our modern writers seem not to have attended to the true state of the ancient controversy between the prophets of God and Idolaters, that matter is considered by Mr. Farmer; after which, he proceeds to the sixth and last section of the third chapter. The design of this section is to shew that the scriptures uniformly represent all miracles as being, in themselves, an absolute demonstration of the divinity of the mission and doctrine of the prophets at whose instance they are performed, and never direct us to regard their doctrines as a test of the miracles being the effect of a divine interposition. Besides taking some notice of the miracles of Moses and the prophets in this view, our Author here distinctly examines the miracles performed by Christ and his apostles, and refutes an objection that may be drawn from Matth. xii. 26, 27. The Pharisees did not ascribe the miracles of our Lord in general to the assistance of demons, nor did Jesus refer them to his doctrine, in order to determine the divinity of his works.

" It is to little purpose, therefore, to plead," says Mr. Farmer towards the close of the section, " as " the advocates of Christianity are apt to do, that the " nature of the doctrines which miracles are designed " to confirm will serve to point out the Author of " the works, inasmuch as this can do no service to " Christianity; for, the divinely-authorized teachers " of it did not, and, considering the prejudices of the " first converts, could not, make this use of its doctrines. " Had there been any ambiguity in the proof from " miracles, it would have been rejected by those to " whom it was at first proposed. In latter ages " learned men have adventured (such is the pre- " sumption and weakness of human reason, in many " persons endowed with the largest measure of it) to " demonstrate, à priori, that it became God to inter- " pose for the reformation of the world, just at the " time and in the manner related in the gospel; " and hence they infer the divinity of its miracles, and " very often even their truth. But it is certain, that " in the age, in which the gospel was published, " nothing seemed more incredible than its grand " doctrine, that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah. " And Jesus and his apostles won men to the belief " of this article by the evidence of prophecies and " miracles, without once appealing to the internal " credibility of it, or entering into any metaphysical " reasoning and disquisitions concerning the dispen- " sations of Providence.

" Indeed, setting all prejudice aside, the Messiah- " ship of Jesus of Nazareth is a doctrine which natural " reason cannot, of itself, discover to be either true " or false. It is a doctrine which admits of no other " proof than the testimonies of prophecies and mira- " cles, and can never itself serve to manifest their " divine original.

" A late celebrated writer seems to have been sen- " sible of this, when he said (2), 'that we are to " distinguish between the doctrines we prove by mi- " racles and the doctrines by which we try miracles; " and that they are not the same doctrines.' With " what a number of subtle distinctions have the " learned perplexed the evidence of the gospel, such " as render it very unfit for being (what it was, by " its gracious author, designed to be) the religion of " the poor and illiterate! If miracles are common to " all superior beings, is it evident to an ordinary " capacity, that they necessarily argue the immediate " interposition of God, when performed by a person " who teaches lessons of morality, though at the same " time he alleged his miracles in confirmation of " claims and powers quite distinct from, and superior " to, that of a teacher of morality, such as his being " the Messiah and Son of God? Besides, if the purity " of Christ's moral precepts be a necessary test of the " divinity of his works, wrought to establish his ex- " traordinary pretensions and character, how comes " it to pass that neither Christ nor his apostles have " given us any information concerning this matter? " As they have no where told us what those doctrines " are by which we are to try their miracles, if there " be such doctrines, are they not chargeable with " the most criminal omission? an omission which no " human wisdom or sagacity can supply. Nay, upon " the sole evidence of miracles, they demanded faith " in Christ as the Messiah before they instructed men " in any other doctrines, and therefore certainly " without submitting them to previous examination; " which would have been very unreasonable, if those " other doctrines are a necessary test of the divinity " of their miracles.

" The plain matter of fact, as it appears to me, is " this: they never taught men to try their miracles, " either by the doctrine they were immediately de- " signed to confirm, or by any other; but, on the " contrary, taught men to judge of their doctrine by " their miracles. The very purity of the Christian " doctrine, as well as the nature of Christ's personal " claims, rendered this conduct necessary. The Jews " in general, and the Pagans more especially, were " plunged into the deepest corruption. The latter " were not only idolaters, but worshipped their gods " by acts of uncleanness, such as were suitable to " their apprehended natures. Would not the purity " of the gospel create in such persons a prejudice " against its miracles? What could engage them to " embrace a doctrine that contradicted every senti- " ment and affection of their hearts, but such works " as were in themselves, and according to the genuine " sentiments of nature, certain and evident proofs of " a divine interposition? Those, therefore, who en- " deavour to prove, that miracles alone are not a suf- " ficient criterion of a divine mission, do not attend " to the nature of the Christian dispensation, nor to " the state of the world when it was first erected. " They likewise impeach the conduct of Christ and " his apostles, and labour to destroy (though without " designing it) the very foundation on which Chris- " tianity is built. We have shewn, in general, that, " if miracles are ever performed in support of false- " hood, they can never afford certain evidence of a " divine commission: least of all, then, can they " serve to establish the divine mission and authority " of Christ, which he requires us to acknowledge " upon the account of his miracles, as in themselves a " complete and sufficient evidence."

The design of the fourth chapter is to shew, that the scriptures have not recorded any instances of real miracles performed by the devil. Our author, in considering this part of his subject, has examined the objections that may be drawn from the case of the magicians in Egypt, and from the appearance of Samuel, after his decease, to Saul. In order to prove that the magicians did not perform works really supernatural, nor were assisted by any superior beings, the following points are discussed at large: 1. The character and pretensions of the magicians. 2. The true intention of Pharaoh in sending for them, and the fact different from and even contrary to his own. This he did with great accuracy and ſucceſs, ſo as entirely to clear himſelf from the aſperſion that had been caſt upon him. Our author did not, however, ſolely confine himſelf to the point of vindicating his reputation from an injurious charge, but took occaſion ſtill farther to confirm and illuſtrate the ſentiments advanced in his diſſertation. With reſpect to the ancient magic in particular, he added a number of important remarks. As to Le Moine, "if "you chuſe to aſk me," ſays Mr. Farmer, at the concluſion of the pamphlet, "Are "you indebted to him? I anſwer, that, from all that hath been offered to ſhew that "our views of the ſubject are diſtinct and oppoſite, it appears, how impoſſible it is "that I ſhould be materially indebted to this author. Nor have I any remembrance "that I am indebted to him at all. My ſentiments upon miracles were formed, and "many of my papers upon this ſubject were ſubmitted to the inſpection of a friend, "before the publication of Mr. Le Moine's treatiſe. I read it when it firſt came out, "but do not remember that I ever reviſed it afterwards. I am certain, I did not con-"ſult it when I prepared my papers for the preſs; which being originally deſigned "for my own ſatisfaction, had lain by me untouched for many years. I could be "under little temptation to reviſe an author, whoſe peculiar ſentiments I do univer-"ſally and entirely diſapprove." The truth of theſe aſſertions could not be denied by thoſe who had diligently compared the two treatiſes in queſtion together. But, notwithſtanding ſo clear and full a vindication, the calumny continued to be repeated. The charge, againſt Mr. Farmer, of having borrowed from Le Moine, was, in particular, urged again and again, with great violence, in the London Magazine of that time. Indeed, in that Magazine, he was inceſſantly purſued (if our memory does not fail us) for the ſpace of fourteen months. It was not, however, againſt Mr. Farmer alone that the repeated attacks of the anonymous critic were directed. They were aimed, likewiſe, at the Monthly Review, by an angry author, the riſe and progreſs of whoſe reſentment, if related, would form no unpleaſant a narration. But, though the writer was blameable in the affair, we are willing to ſpare a gentleman who is far from being wanting in moral worth, and is not wholly a ſtranger to literature.

In 1775, Mr. Farmer gave to the world another important work. This was "An "Eſſay on the Demoniacs of the New Teſtament;" concerning which (independently of the queſtion whether his Hypotheſis be well founded or not) it may truly be aſſerted, that it is written with great perſpicuity of method and language, and is replete with excellent learning, good ſenſe, and maſterly criticiſm. Thoſe who have not the book (which is now becoming ſcarce), or who are indiſpoſed to read a large treatiſe on the abſurdity of the intention commonly aſcribed to him. 3. The motives which might induce the magicians to attempt an imitation of the works of Moſes. 4. The acts done by Moſes, and the principles on which he acted. 5. The language in which Moſes deſcribes the works of the magicians. And, 6. The nature of the ſeveral works done by them. The caſe of Samuel's appearance to Saul at Endor, is conſidered with equal attention, and Mr. Farmer favours the opinion, that God did either raiſe up Samuel, or preſent a likeneſs or image of him before Saul, to denounce the divine judgment againſt him for the crime he was committing, in applying to a reputed ſorcereſs. Our Saviour's temptations in the wilderneſs fall within this part of the author's plan; but he has formerly examined them in a diſtinct treatiſe (3).

The fifth and laſt chapter of the work before us is taken up in ſhewing, that miracles, conſidered as divine interpoſitions, are a certain proof of the miſſion and doctrine of a prophet; and, in pointing out the advantages and neceſſity of this proof, in confirming and propagating a new revelation. At the beginning of the chapter, Mr. Farmer ſtates the circumſtances under which miracles prove the divinity of a prophet's miſſion and doctrine; and guards his readers againſt two extremes, that of conſidering miracles as proofs only of power on the one hand, and, on the other, that of repreſenting them as proofs of the univerſal and perpetual inſpiration of the perſon who performs them. After this he goes on to evince, that the proof, from miracles, of the divine commiſſion and doctrine of a prophet, is in itſelf deciſive and abſolute; that this proof is natural, and agreeable to the common ſenſe of mankind in all ages: that it is eaſy and compendious; that miracles conſtitute a powerful method of conviction, without being violent and compulſive; that they are neceſſary to atteſt a divine commiſſion, and to confirm and propagate a new revelation, ſuch eſpecially as contradicts men's prejudices and paſſions; that they ſerve to revive and confirm the principles of natural religion, and to recover men from the two oppoſite extremes of Atheiſm and Idolatry; and that the evidence of miracles, whether of power or knowledge, is the fitteſt to accompany a ſtanding revelation, becauſe it may be conveyed to diſtant ages and nations.

We have no heſitation in pronouncing this treatiſe to be the moſt important and maſterly performance we have ever yet ſeen on the nature, origin, and deſign of miracles. The former writers upon the ſubject, who may be thought, in ſome reſpects, the moſt to coincide with our author, will be found to differ from him, and to be inferior to him in ſeveral very conſiderable points. They are miſtaken in their deſcriptions of the nature of miracles; they aſcribe an undue power to evil ſpirits; and are ſilent or defective with regard to a number of queſtions fully examined by Mr. Farmer. No one, in particular, can be compared with him, for the extenſive, learned, and judicious, manner in which he hath diſcuſſed and confuted the ſyſtem of demoniſm, or for the perſpicuity and ſtrength wherewith he hath ſtated the certain evidence that miracles afford of the divine commiſſion and doctrine of a prophet.

Were we to recommend, to a young perſon, a proper method of ſtudy, with relation to the ſubject of miracles, we ſhould adviſe him to begin with this book. Having thus laid a right foundation, he would proceed with great advantage to the valuable productions of Clarke, Douglas, Adams, Campbell, Claparede, and the other ingenious writers who have conſidered the poſitive teſtimony in favour of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian miracles, and endeavoured to remove the difficulties, and to anſwer the objections which have been raiſed againſt this teſtimony by the enemies of revelation.

[C] May not be diſpleaſed to ſee an analyſis of it in the note.] The deſign of the firſt chapter of the treatiſe before us is to explain and eſtabliſh the true meaning of the Demoniacs of the New Teſtament. In the proſecution of this deſign, our author lays down ten propoſitions, the firſt of which is, that the ſpirits, that were thought to take poſſeſſion of men's bodies, are called in the New Teſtament Demons, not devils. Strange as it may ſeem, it is nevertheleſs an undoubted fact, that there is not a ſingle paſſage, in which the devil or devils are ſpoken of, in reference to the preſent ſubject. Though poſſeſſed perſons are ſo very frequently mentioned in the Goſpels, they are not, on any occaſion whatever, ſaid to have or to be poſſeſſed by the Devil. They are uniformly and invariably deſcribed as having, or being poſſeſſed by, a Demon or Demons. Beelzebub is called the Prince of Demons, not of Devils. An objection having been urged, that our Saviour uſed Satan and Beelzebub as names of the ſame perſon, Mr. Farmer ſhews, with much ingenuity, that it by no means follows, from the paſſage on which the objection is grounded, that the Devil is called Beelzebub.

The ſecond propoſition is, that by Demons, whenever the word occurs in reference to poſſeſſions, either in the Scriptures, or other ancient writings, we are to underſtand, not fallen angels, but the Pagan deities, ſuch as had once been men. For the proof of this point, an appeal is made to the teſtimonies of the Heathens, and eſpecially the Greeks and Romans; to the ſentiments of the Jews in general, and the Phariſees in particular; to the language of Chriſt and his Apoſtles; and to the declarations of the primitive Chriſtians. In the courſe of the argument ſome obſervations are introduced concerning Beelzebub, which are ſo curious that we cannot avoid laying them before our readers; omitting, at the ſame time, the notes and references that are ſubjoined, by our author, in ſupport of his remarks:

"In the late controverſy, ſays he, concerning Demoniacs, it was confidently aſſerted by one party, and either allowed or not diſputed by the other, 'that Beelzebub is the name which the Jews gave to the prince of fallen angels; and that it was given him by way of deriſion; Beelzebub being the ſame with Baalzebub, and ſignifying as that doth, the lord of a fly.' Now, were it true, that Beelzebub is a fallen angel, Demons, without doubt, are ſpirits of the ſame order. But what hath been aſſerted by ſome with regard to this matter, and too readily granted by others, hath never yet been proved. The point deſerves to be carefully conſidered.

"We learn, from the Old Teſtament, that Ahaziah ſent meſſengers, and ſaid unto them, Go, inquire of Baalzebub, the god of Ekron, whether I ſhall recover of this diſeaſe. From this paſſage it clearly appears, that Beelzebub was a god of the Philiſtines, and had a temple and oracle at Ekron. It likewiſe appears, that this name was not given him by way of contempt; becauſe it was uſed by Ahaziah at the very time he was acknowledging his divinity, and deſirous of conſulting him concerning his recovery. This is farther evident from the true meaning of this name, and the reaſon of its being given. Hiſtory informs us, what we may eaſily credit, that thoſe who lived in hot climates, and where the ſoil is moiſt (which was the caſe of the Ekronites, who bordered upon the ſea) were exceedingly infeſted with flies. Theſe inſects were ſometimes thought to cauſe contagious diſtempers. Pliny makes mention of a people who ſtopped a peſtilence, which they occaſioned, by ſacrificing to the fly-hunting god. It ſeems not improbable, that ſome imagined cure of this kind, or a general perſuaſion of his power of driving away flies from the places they frequented, might be the reaſon why the god of Ekron was called Beelzebub. For it was cuſtomary with the Heathens, to call their gods by the name of thoſe inſects, from which they were believed to deliver their worſhippers. The god of flies, and the fly-hunter, were titles aſcribed by the Greeks to Jupiter, as well as to Hercules. Now, inaſmuch as Beelzebub is a title of honour, and ſuch as might be, and certainly was, applied to the god of Ekron by his worſhippers, it can hardly be doubted, but that it was in uſe amongſt the Philiſtines as well as amongſt the Jews. Whatever opinion the latter had formed of the moral character of the prince of Demons, yet, even they did not call him Beelzebub by way of deriſion, notwithſtanding the ſeeming meaning of this term, the lord of flies. For, the Jews had learned of the Heathens, to regard a power of driving away thoſe noxious inſects as a divine prerogative; endeavouring to perſuade men, that the temple of Jeruſalem, though ſo many ſacrifices were offered there daily, never had a fly upon it; thus copying, rather than deriding, what the Heathens fabled concerning ſome of their temples, into which (according to Pliny, Solinus, and others) no fly could enter.

"Upon what grounds then it is concluded, that by Beelzebub, we are to underſtand the devil, if by the devil be meaned a fallen angel? Can this be proved from the import of the name? There is no kind of affinity between Beelzebub and devil either in the ſound or meaning. Were the Jews accuſtomed to call the devil by the name of Beelzebub? The very contrary appears from their ancient writings, in which he is called Aſmodæus. This is a great objection againſt the common hypotheſis. The difficulty was felt and confeſſed by Bochart, Selden, and others. But theſe learned men did not advert, that the Phariſees were not ſpeaking of the devil. It is indeed in the higheſt degree improbable, that there ſhould be any reference here to the devil, for this farther reaſon, that he is never ſpoken of in Scripture as poſſeſſing men's bodies; this was deemed the peculiar office of demons. Beelzebub was the prince of the poſſeſſing demons, in the eſtimation of the Phariſees; and, therefore, in their eſtimation, was a human ſpirit; as will be ſhewn immediately upon the expreſs teſtimony of a learned Phariſee. Laſtly, Beelzebub was a Heathen deity: for he is ſpoken of here as a Demon, which was the uſual appellation of the Heathen deities; he is expreſsly called, in the Old Teſtament, the god of Ekron, and is repreſented by the Phariſees under the very ſame title and character as the Heathens themſelves aſcribed to their gods. The Phariſees, therefore, under this title, did not refer to a different perſon from what the Heathens did. Now, if Beelzebub was a Heathen demon, or deity, he was no other than a deified human ſpirit: for, ſuch were all the Heathen demons, who were the more immediate objects of the public eſtabliſhed worſhip, and thoſe in particular to whom divination and oracles were aſcribed. And if the prince of demons was of human extract, no doubt his ſubjects were ſo likewiſe."

In the ſection, from which the preceding extract is taken, Mr. Farmer hath learnedly explained whence it came to paſs that the fathers, after the time of Juſtin Martyr, referred poſſeſſions to celeſtial Demons; and hath conſidered the ſpirit of Python, or Apollo, with which the damſel at Philippi was thought to be poſſeſſed.

That the Demons, who were believed to take poſſeſſion of men's bodies, were probably regarded by the Jews as evil beings is ſhewn under the third propoſition. In this light were Demons conſidered by the Heathens, and by Joſephus; and yet they did not look upon them as fallen angels. But, though ſome of the epithets, given by the Evangeliſts to the ſpirits ejected by Chriſt, ſeem rather beſt to agree with the ſuppoſition of their being of an immoral nature, our author obſerves, that it is not certain, whether the epithets of evil and unclean were given them to expreſs their perſonal diſpoſitions, or only thoſe effects they were ſuppoſed to produce. The word evil might be applied to a demon, on account of the pain and miſery he was thought to create. And it is poſſible, that Demons might be called unclean, becauſe perſons

mer's opinion concerning the Demoniacs, though far from being novel, was too remote from perſons under that melancholy and maniacal diſorder, of which they were the reputed authors, avoided the ſociety of men, and were continually defiling themſelves with objects eſteemed by the Jews unclean.

It is evinced, under the two next propoſitions, that thoſe perſons, who are ſpoken of as having demons, ſuffered real and very violent diſorders, from whatever cauſe theſe diſorders proceeded; and that the particular diſorders which the ancients, whether Heathens or Jews, aſcribed to the poſſeſſion of Demons, were ſuch only as diſturbed the underſtanding. A diſtinction is here carefully to be made between diſeaſes ſupernaturally inflicted and poſſeſſions. The ancient Heathens attributed diſeaſes in general to the anger of the immortal gods. But they did not repreſent all perſons whom the gods or Demons viſited with diſeaſes, as having thoſe gods or Demons within them, which was ſuppoſed to be the caſe with all Demoniacs. Poſſeſſion included in it the idea of madneſs, amongſt the Latins, the Greeks, the Jews, and other Eaſtern people. That all the poſſeſſed were mad, is farther proved, by Mr. Farmer, from the dramatic writings of the ancients.

"Beſides madneſs, the ancients aſcribed the epi-
"lepſy to poſſeſſion; eſteeming this diſorder ſacred
"on account of the entrance of Demons into the bo"dies of thoſe who ſuffered under it. Theſe two,
"the epilepſy and madneſs, are kindred diſorders.
"The former is often the conſequence of the latter,
"and the fits of it are always attended with a depri"vation of the underſtanding, and with convulſive
"agitations, or a frantic and mad behaviour. Be-"ſides madneſs, continues our learned writer, and "(what are ſo nearly allied to it) epileptic fits, I "know of no diſtemper that the Ancients aſcribed
"to poſſeſſion; unleſs, perhaps, fits of apoplexy,
"which alſo affect the brain, the ſuppoſed reſidence
"of thoſe Demons who entered the bodies of men.
"Whatever may have occurred to others, who have "a more enlarged view of the ſubject: yet, with re-
"ſpect to myſelf, I muſt own, that, after having taken
"ſome pains in making enquiry into the ſenſe of the "Ancients upon it, I have not been able to find any
"caſe of (what was called) demoniacal poſſeſſion, that "was not attended with ſome diſorder of the under"ſtanding. Indeed, it ſeems to me very unlikely,
"that any inſtance from amongſt the Ancients ſhould
"ever be produced of a perſon ſaid to be poſſeſſed,
"who was in his right mind; inaſmuch as all the "Ancients, in their ſeveral languages, employed
"the word, which ſignified poſſeſſion, to expreſs
"madneſs."

How far the language of Scripture correſponds with the ſentiments of Pagan and Jewiſh antiquity is the ſubject of inquiry under the ſixth propoſition; which is, that the Demoniacs, ſpoken of in the New Teſtament, were all either madmen or epileptics. Mr. Farmer evinces the truth of this poſition, from the Jews reproaching Chriſt with having a Demon, and Beelzebub; from a ſimilar reproach which was caſt upon John the Baptiſt; and from a particular conſideration of the deſcription that is given of the Gadarene Demoniac. Our author proves, likewiſe, that the Pythoneſs at Philippi was a raving propheteſs. Thoſe who lived near the times of the Evangeliſts were under no difficulty to underſtand their meaning, when they ſpake of the Demoniacs. This appears from a paſſage of Celſus concerning Mary Magdalen; in which he calls her a diſtracted woman, referring to the account given of her in the Goſpels, that out of her went ſeven Demons.—Upon the whole, it is evident, that the Demoniacs ſpoken of in the New Teſtament were ſuppoſed to have Demons (that is, the ſouls of wicked men) reſiding in them, and to act entirely under their malignant influence: that theſe Demoniacs were either madmen of one kind or other, or ſubject to epileptic fits, which are ever attended with a ſuſpenſion of the regular exerciſe of the underſtanding: and that it was from the ſymptoms of theſe diſorders that it was inferred the patients were poſſeſſed by Demons.

Dr. Lardner having contended, "that all thoſe ſaid to have evil ſpirits were not diſcompoſed in their mind," Mr. Farmer gives a full anſwer to the Doctor's objections: after which, he proceeds to ſhew, upon what grounds poſſeſſions are diſtinguiſhed from diſeaſes in general, and from lunacies in particular; and for what reaſon madneſs and epileptic fits, rather than other diſorders, are aſcribed to poſſeſſion. With regard to the diſtinction between poſſeſſions and lunacies, our ingenious writer obſerves, that, in order to underſtand this matter, it is neceſſary to examine the ſentiments of antiquity concerning it. Now it was the general opinion of antiquity, that ſome diſeaſes are owing to the influence of the celeſtial bodies; and that the paroxyſms and periods of others are regulated by the moon in particular. This was the caſe more eſpecially with reſpect to epileptic diſeaſes, the fits of which, it was affirmed, conſtantly returned every new and full moon.—Hence epileptics were, by the Greeks and Latins, called lunatics. The Evangeliſt Matthew, therefore, without doubt, by lunatics meant epileptics. We ſee, then, on what grounds the Ancients in general, and the Evangeliſts in particular, diſtinguiſhed between Demoniacs and Lunatics; the former of whom we call Maniacs, and the latter Epileptics. Theſe two diſorders are attended with very different ſymptoms; and they were formerly by ſome aſcribed to different cauſes.—It is neceſſary to add, that the ſame perſon was reputed by many both a Demoniac and Lunatic; a Demoniac, becauſe they referred the epilepſy to the poſſeſſion of Demons; a Lunatic, becauſe the fits of this diſorder were ſuppoſed to keep lunar periods.—This, perhaps, was thought to be the caſe of the youth deſcribed in the Goſpel. His father repreſents him both as a lunatic and ſore vexed with a Demon. He was what ſome modern phyſicians call epileptic mad. He was not conſidered as being mad or vexed with a Demon at all times, but only under the paroxyſms of his epileptic diſorder, which returned at the changes of the moon.—Our author's account of things in this ſection, juſtifies the repreſentation he had before made of Demoniacs, as perſons that laboured under real diſorders; and is confirmed by the ancient Chriſtian writers, who deſcribe Demoniacs as men diſordered in their mind.

In the two following ſections Mr. Farmer proves, in a ſatisfactory manner, that demoniacal poſſeſſions, and the diſorders imputed to them, were not peculiar to the country of Judea, and the time of Chriſt, or abounded more in that country, or at that time, than any other; and that the Demoniacs of the New Teſtament are not different from thoſe mentioned in other ancient writers.

His ninth propoſition is, that there is no ſufficient evidence from REASON for the reality of demoniacal poſſeſſions; nay, that reaſon ſtrongly remonſtrates againſt it. Upon this topic our author diſplays great ſtrength of argument. There is no natural evidence of the ſpirits of dead men having power to enter the bodies of the living. Thoſe who firſt invented this doctrine, were men unacquainted with Nature, and yet ambitious of accounting for its moſt myſterious phænomena.—On the other hand, thoſe perſons whoſe minds were not diſturbed by ſuperſtitious terrors, and who gained an inſight into nature, pronounced what commonly paſſed for demoniacal poſſeſſions, to be mere natural diſorders. This was the caſe, not only with the Sadducees and the Epicureans, but alſo with the Peripatetics. This was the caſe with Ariſtotle, the founder of their ſect, and who is juſtly ſtyled the Prince of Philoſophers; with the divine Hippocrates, equally eminent for his piety and judgment; with Celſus, Plotinus, Poſidonius, and others. And it is known to every one, that, ſince the improvements of Science in later times, the moſt able and judicious phyſicians have confirmed by their ſuffrages the opinion of the moſt learned and judicious, amongſt the Ancients, upon the ſubject before us.

from the general apprehenſions of the Chriſtian world to give univerſal ſatisfaction. Accord-

In the proſecution of his argument, Mr. Farmer ſhews, not only that the diſorders imputed to poſſeſſion may proceed from natural cauſes, but that they actually do ſo, and are cured by natural remedies. He repreſents, likewiſe, the inconſiſtency of real poſſeſſions with the order of the natural world, and the wiſdom and goodneſs of God; and exhibits, in a clear and ſtriking light, the abſurdity and danger of allowing, that men are in the power of ſuperior malevolent ſpirits.

The tenth ſection of the firſt chapter brings us to our author's laſt propoſition; which is, that the doctrine of demoniacal poſſeſſions, inſtead of being ſupported by the Jewiſh or Chriſtian revelation, is utterly ſubverted by both. This ſection conſtitutes a very important, and highly laboured part of the preſent treatiſe. The doctrine of demoniacal poſſeſſions was not originally founded on revelation; neither was it taught, or referred to, by the ancient prophets. There were ſeveral occaſions on which the mention of it might have been expected in the Old Teſtament, had it been revealed under that diſpenſation. But the Old Teſtament is ſilent on the ſubject, and cannot be employed in favour of poſſeſſions. With regard to the prophets of the New Teſtament, they were not the original authors of this doctrine. It was generally entertained before the age of the Goſpel, and it was common, both among Jews and Gentiles, in our Saviour's time; but it never received the ſanction of Chriſt or his Apoſtles.—Nay, it is inconſiſtent with the fundamental principle of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian diſpenſations: with the evidence of miracles in general, on which they reſt; and with the nature of that miracle in particular, which was performed upon Demoniacs. This laſt circumſtance is ingeniouſly diſcuſſed by our author; who then comes to another part of his argument, which is, that all the prophets of God, in every age, when profeſſedly delivering their divine meſſages to mankind, have with one voice proclaimed the utter impotence of Demons; and hereby entirely ſubverted the doctrine of demoniacal poſſeſſions.

To avoid repeating what had occurred in his Diſſertation upon Miracles, Mr. Farmer enters into a long and curious examination of a paſſage of St. Paul, in the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians: We know that an idol is nothing in the world; and that there is none other God but one. As our limits will not permit us to lay this maſterly criticiſm before our readers, we muſt content ourſelves with giving an extract from what, in the courſe of the enquiry, is advanced concerning St. James's aſſertion, that the Devils (in the original, the Demons) believe and tremble; though without the notes by which the writer's remarks are accompanied:

"I do not remember," ſays our author, "to have "ſeen it obſerved by any writer (and therefore I ſub-"mit the obſervation entirely to the judgment of "others) that this paſſage is taken from one in the "book of Job, which we unhappily render, Dead "things are formed from under the waters, and the in-"habitants thereof; but which may more properly "be tranſlated, The giants tremble under the waters "(or in the abyſs) together with their hoſt, or fellow-"inhabitants. Job is here celebrating the dominion "of God over the manſions of the dead; and he af-"firms, that the giants, the ſouls of thoſe mighty "men, who were ſuch a terror to the old world, and "periſhed by the deluge, do now tremble in the in-"fernal regions, together with thoſe who were once "their contemporaries on earth, or that now inhabit "the ſame manſions. That the Jews thought that "Job here referred to wicked ghoſts, to the ghoſts "eſpecially of the ancient giants, clearly appears "from the Chaldee Paraphraſe, and from the Sep-"tuagint. The words, however, may be underſtood "in a more general ſenſe to the following effect: "'The departed ſouls of the wicked tremble in the "loweſt ſheol, even all the inhabitants of thoſe gloomy "manſions.' Now the demons of St. James anſwer "to theſe departed ſouls in Job, whether you under-"ſtand thereby the ghoſts of the wicked in general, "or thoſe of the antediluvian giants in particular. "For, demons denoted the ghoſts of wicked men, of "ſuch eſpecially as ſuffered a violent death, and par-"ticularly thoſe deſtroyed by the flood, who were "conſidered as the worſt kind of demons. So that "the Apoſtle ſeems only to have tranſlated this paſ-"ſage of Job, when he ſaid, The demons tremble. As "to the additional circumſtance of their believing, "mentioned in the tranſlation, it is clearly implied "in the original; a dread of God's juſtice being in-"conſiſtent with a diſbelief of his exiſtence. I add, "that St. James doth not appear to be delivering any "new doctrine concerning demons in this place, but "rather to be arguing with the perſons to whom he "writes, upon their own principles, or appealing to "a fact that they would not diſpute, becauſe eſta-"bliſhed upon the authority of the Old Teſtament. "Thou believeſt there is one God, and ſo far thou doſt "well: but this faith alone is not ſufficient; for, the "demons alſo believe and tremble. In reaſoning with "Jews, or with Jewiſh converts, what was more na-"tural than to employ a principle allowed by them-"ſelves, and contained in their own Scriptures? It "is the more reaſonable to ſuppoſe that the text in "queſtion is borrowed from theſe writings, as the "immediately-ſucceeding arguments, from the caſe "of Abraham and of Rahab, are certainly drawn "from thence. If the foregoing obſervations are juſt, "this paſſage is a clear proof that, by demons in the "New Teſtament, we are ſometimes to underſtand "the ghoſts of dead men."

The ſecond chapter of this work is employed in ſolving the ſeveral objections which have been urged againſt the foregoing explication of the Goſpel Demoniacs; and is divided into three ſections. The buſineſs of the firſt ſection is to anſwer the objection which is drawn from what was ſaid and done by the Demoniacs themſelves, whence ſome have concluded, that they were inſpired and aſſiſted by ſuperior agents, ſuch as Demons are commonly ſuppoſed to be. As, however, it muſt, be allowed, that the New Teſtament never repreſents the language and behaviour of the Demoniacs as the effect and evidence of a ſupernatural agency, it is only to be examined whether ſuch agency can be juſtly and certainly inferred from the facts themſelves.

It is pleaded, that the Demoniacs knew and proclaimed Jeſus to be the Meſſiah. But this may be accounted for, by conſidering the extraordinary circumſtances which, at that time, rendered Jeſus the object of univerſal attention; propagated his fame throughout all Judea, and the countries bordering upon it; and created in the Jewiſh people a ſtrong perſuaſion that he was the Meſſiah. Might not the Demoniacs, therefore, long before they were ſeized with their diſorder, learn in common with others, the high character of the Meſſiah, then univerſally expected? And, in their intervals of ſanity, ſo very common to perſons of a diſordered underſtanding, might they not hear of the fame of Jeſus as the expected Meſſiah, which was ſpread in all places before they made any acknowledgment of his character? It is, indeed, ſcarcely poſſible that they could be ignorant of him, becauſe, in general, they were under no confinement.

"If I might be allowed to propoſe a conjecture," ſays Mr. Farmer, "I would obſerve, that perhaps "the Demoniacs would run into the common opinion "concerning Jeſus as the promiſed Meſſiah more "eagerly than perſons of a cooler judgment; the lat-"ter being ſtruck with ſome contrary appearances in "his character (ſuch as the poverty of his condition, "and the ſpiritual nature of his doctrine) which "eſcaped the attention of the former, who, for this "reaſon, with greater confidence, ſaluted him under "his high character, agreeably to the firſt impreſſion "which his miracles made on the minds of all men. "This ſeems to me much more probable, than that "infernal ſpirits ſhould freely and zealouſly aſſert the "divine claims, and ſpread the glory, of Jeſus as Accordingly, it was ſoon attacked by Dr. Worthington, a reſpectable and learned clergy-

" the Meſſiah."—The caſe of the Pythoneſs is explained by the ſame train of reaſoning.

It is urged farther, that Chriſt commanded the Devils (Demons) not to diſcover him. In order to ſolve this difficulty, our author has recourſe to the idea which the Ancients entertained concerning Demoniacs; from which it appears, that, as Chriſt, in conformity to the accuſtomed modes of ſpeech, commanded Demons to come out, he might, upon the ſame principle, command them to be ſilent. Nor was any thing more likely to awe the Demoniac himſelf into immediate ſilence than his hearing ſuch a command delivered to the ſpirits, that (in his opinion) actuated him, by one ſo famed as Jeſus was for his power of controling them. The language was adapted to his apprehenſions and the diſturbed ſtate of his mind.—With regard to our Lord's prohibiting the Demoniacs from declaring him openly to be the Meſſiah, this prohibition was as properly given to them as it was to his own diſciples, and alſo to many others. Or, if Jeſus had any peculiar reaſon for checking the zeal of the Demoniacs, it probably was the deſire of leaving no room for the ſpecious pretence, that there was a ſecret agreement between him and thoſe evil ſpirits, who were judged to be ſo eager in applauding him.

Again, ſome have ſaid, that Demoniacs could not be mere madmen, becauſe they argue with Chriſt in a very rational manner, and ſpeak to better purpoſe than the bulk of thoſe who were in their ſenſes. As this aſſertion is chiefly founded upon the behaviour of the Gadarene Demoniac, Mr. Farmer makes a full inquiry into the circumſtances related concerning him, in order to ſee how far they agree with the ſuppoſition of his being directed and aſſiſted by ſuperior intelligences in all that he ſaid and did. The reſult of the inquiry is, that there are not, in any part of his conduct, the ſigns of extraordinary ſagacity, ſuch as mark the agency of a ſpirit of celeſtial origin. On the contrary, the behaviour of the Demoniac appears to be that of a madman, agreeably to the expreſs repreſentation of him in the hiſtory. Nor is any one circumſtance mentioned concerning him inconſiſtent with this repreſentation.

It hath, alſo, been alleged, that Demoniacs diſcovered more than human ſtrength. But it is ſhewn, in anſwer to this allegation, that neither the Gadarene Demoniac, nor the demoniac at Epheſus, exerted any greater ſtrength than what mere madmen diſcover, from an extraordinary flow of animal ſpirits, or from ſome other cauſe, eſpecially in the moſt violent paroxyſms of their diſorder.

In the next ſection, our author examines the argument in favour of real poſſeſſions taken from the deſtruction of the herd of ſwine, which the Demons are ſaid to have entered, and ſtimulated to inſtantaneous madneſs. This caſe is conſidered by ſome as a deciſive proof of the power of Demons, both over the human and brutal race, and is thought even to have been purpoſely deſigned by Providence to convince us of this principle, and to refute the oppoſite opinion.

To enervate this argument, Dr. Sykes ſuggeſted, and Dr. Lardner ſtrenuouſly contended, that the ſwine were frighted by the two madmen, and ſo driven down the precipice into the ſea. On the other hand, the advocates for the common hypotheſis inſiſt upon it (and with great reaſon) that it was impoſſible for two men, however fierce, to put ſo vaſt a herd of ſwine as two thouſand into motion in an inſtant, and to cauſe them all to ruſh with violence down a precipice into the ſea: ſwine, contrary to the nature of moſt other animals, running different ways when they are driven. But it doth not appear from the hiſtory, that the men ever fell upon the herd, or made any attempt to drive them into the ſea. When, it is ſaid, that the Demons went out of the madmen, and entered the ſwine, the Evangeliſts, if their language be interpreted agreeably to the popular opinion on which it is founded, muſt mean, that the madmen, in conſequence of the departure of the Demons, were cured, and reſtored to their right mind; and that they were cured before the ſwine were diſordered. It is evident likewiſe from the hiſtory, that at the time the Demoniacs were cured, they were preſent with Chriſt; and the herd of ſwine at ſome diſtance from them. The deſtruction of the ſwine is expreſsly aſcribed, not to their being driven by the Demoniacs, but to the entrance of Demons into them, or to their being ſeized with the ſame diſorder from which the men were relieved. All that can be inferred from the Evangeliſts ſaying that the Demons came out of the men, and entered into the herd of ſwine, is, that the madneſs of the former was transferred to the latter, in the ſame ſenſe as the leproſy of Naaman was to cleave to Gehazi, and to his ſeed for ever. So great a miracle as that wrought upon the ſwine can be aſcribed to no other agency than that of God. Accordingly, we are told, that it was performed at the word or command of Chriſt: forthwith Jeſus gave them (the Demons, the reputed cauſes of madneſs) leave, and ſaid unto them, Go. Should an enquiry be made into the reaſons of this divine diſpenſation, it might be anſwered, that He who gave life to all hath a right to reſume it, and doth often reſume it, both from men and beaſts, and viſit their bodies with diſorders, for reaſons unſearchable by the human underſtanding. However, Mr. Farmer points out ſeveral wiſe and important purpoſes that were anſwered by the miraculous deſtruction of the ſwine. 1. It was a juſt puniſhment of the owners. 2. It ſerved to aſcertain the reality and to ſpread the fame of the miracles performed upon the Demoniacs. 3. It was calculated to correct the falſe notions, concerning the power of Demons, which were entertained in that age, as well by Jews as Gentiles, by both of whom Gadara was inhabited. 4. This miracle prevented ſeveral great inconveniences that would otherwiſe have attended the miniſtry of Chriſt. And, laſtly, though the Goſpel, conſidered as a diſpenſation of mercy, was, with great propriety, confirmed chiefly by miracles of mercy; yet it was neceſſary there ſhould be ſome examples of ſeverity to check the preſumption of mankind in all ages, and to warn them of the danger of rejecting a divine prophet, who, though he eminently appeared as the meſſenger of God's love, was alſo the appointed miniſter of his juſtice.

The third and laſt ſection of the ſecond chapter, is in anſwer to the moſt popular argument in favour of real poſſeſſions; that which is drawn from the language of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, in performing and recording the cure of the Demoniacs, or in deſcribing the caſe of theſe unhappy perſons. This part of the work before us is much laboured, and contains a variety of important and judicious obſervations. But we can only lay down the general poſitions that are illuſtrated at large by our author: 1. It is cuſtomary with all ſorts of perſons, with the ſacred writers in particular, and our Saviour himſelf, to ſpeak on many ſubjects in the language of the vulgar, though known and admitted to have been originally grounded on a falſe philoſophy. 2. The foregoing obſervation holds true in the caſe before us; for, all ſorts of perſons, and particularly the divinely-commiſſioned inſtructors of mankind, ſpeak in the ſame manner, on the very ſubject in queſtion. They adopt the popular language, without deſigning to countenance the opinion on which that language was originally founded. 3. Chriſt and his Apoſtles had ſufficient reaſon for adopting the common phraſeology with reſpect to Demoniacs (even ſuppoſing them not to approve the hypotheſis on which it was grounded;) becauſe it was employed to deſcribe the real caſe of theſe perſons, both the ſymptoms of their diſorder, and their cure. 4. It doth not appear, that our Lord and his Diſciples had any divine warrant to change the vulgar language in deſcribing the cauſe of the Demoniacs; or that they were immediately and expreſsly commiſſioned by God, to inſtruct mankind in the ſecret cauſes of any of thoſe diſtempers which they were empowered to cure, and to rectify any phyſical miſtakes concerning them. 5. As the firſt publiſhers of the Goſpel were not, ſo they could not, be commiſſioned by clergyman, who had already favoured the public with ſome pious and valuable writings. His anſwer to Mr. Farmer was entituled, "An impartial Inquiry into the Caſe "of the Goſpel Demoniacs. With an Appendix, conſiſting of an Eſſay on Scripture "Demonology, 1777." It is to be lamented, that the good Doctor did not preſerve his temper in the controverſy: nor did he, perhaps, altogether ſuſtain the reputation which he had acquired by his former productions. His notion of the Scripture Demonology is ſo curious, and indeed has ſuch a tincture of a modulated Manichæiſm, that we ſhall inſert a ſummary of it below [D]. There were ſome things advanced in this work, which, in Mr. Farmer's opinion, deſerved to be conſidered; and he thought that certain parts of the ſubject were capable of farther and fuller illuſtration. He printed, therefore, in 1778, "Letters to the Rev. Dr. Worthington, in anſwer to his "late publication, intituled, "An impartial Enquiry into the Caſe of the Goſpel De-"moniacs." Of theſe letters we ſhall content ourſelves with ſaying, that they contain much more additional matter than could have been expected upon a ſubject which the author had before ſo amply conſidered; and that they exhibit a perſpicuous and judicious epitome of what had already been advanced in the courſe of the controverſy. Another of Mr. Farmer's antagoniſts was the Rev. Mr. Fell, a diſſenting Miniſter, at that time of Thaxted in Eſſex, and now one of the tutors of the independent academy at Homerton, Hackney. This gentleman publiſhed, in 1779, a treatiſe, entituled, "Dæmoniacs. An Enquiry into the Heathen and the Scripture Doctrine of Dæmons: "in which the Hypotheſes of the Rev. Mr. Farmer, and others, on this Subject, are "particularly conſidered." We deny not to Mr. Fell the praiſe of ability, acuteneſs, and learning; but we cannot ſpeak with equal commendation of the ſpirit with which his book is written. In particular, we by no means agree with him in his deduction of the injurious conſequences to natural and revealed Religion which he apprehends to reſult from the doctrines advanced in the "Diſſertation on Miracles," and the "Eſſay on "the Demoniacs." It gave us pleaſure, however, to find Mr. Fell, in one place, expreſſing himſelf in the following manner: "Far be it from us to impute any evil de-"ſign to this writer. We doubt not, he really meant to ſerve the cauſe of virtue, "which he thought could not be more effectually done than by removing every thing "which appeared to him in the light of ſuperſtition (f)."

(f) Dæmoniacs, p. 337.

Mr. Farmer's laſt work appeared in 1783, and was entituled, "The general Preva-"lence of the Worſhip of Human Spirits in the ancient Heathen Nations aſſerted and "proved [E]." This work reflects great honour upon the author's abilities and learning; by God to inſtruct mankind in the phyſical cauſes of thoſe diſeaſes which they healed. At leaſt, the reality of poſſeſſions could not be directly and immediately determined by the authority of Chriſt and his Apoſtles without great impropriety.

The concluding chapter, which is, comparatively, a ſhort one, diſplays the inconveniences attending the common explication of the Goſpel Demoniacs, and the advantages that reſult from the account given of them in the two preceding chapters.

[D] That we ſhall inſert it below.] 'Upon the retroſpect of the whole, we find, that there is a being, 'known by the name of the Devil, who is the author 'of all moral evil; whence all natural evils likewiſe 'originate: and who therefore is juſtly to be reckoned 'the evil principle. He introduced evil firſt into the 'world, and ever ſince hath been the great ſupport, 'promoter, and fomenter, of it:—That he hath a 'numerous and formidable band of other apoſtate 'ſpirits, called his angels; who, together with him, 'fell from their firſt eſtate, and are united in con-'federacy with him; working together in ſeducing 'and withdrawing mankind from their duty to, and 'dependance upon, God; inſtigating to, and pro-'moting, all manner of ſin and wickedneſs in the 'world; darkening and perverting the reaſon and 'underſtanding of men; corrupting their wills and 'affections, and deſtroying their ſouls—That God, 'who brings good out of evil, makes uſe of the devil 'and his angels in the government of the world—'That, for this end, he thinks fit ſometimes to give 'him great power over the elements of air and fire, 'and other parts of nature; over the brute creation; 'and likewiſe over the perſons of men; ſo far as to 'permit him to take poſſeſſion of, and act in, their 'bodies; but that his power is under controul; and 'ſubject to certain laws of reſtraint, which he dares 'not tranſgreſs, nor can reſiſt—That the conſum-'mate malignancy of this inveterate enemy of man-'kind is ever-prompting him to do all the miſchief, of 'all kinds, that he can, in the world; but that he is 'checked and overruled, by the ſupreme power of 'his and our Almighty Creator; and ſuffers them not 'to be tempted by him, any farther than they are able 'to bear—That the good are tempted and haraſſed by 'him; but that wicked men are too often led away 'captive by him at his will—That he is employed for 'judgment; for correction; and even for mercy in 'the end—for the gradual reformation of a corrupt 'and wicked world; as we have reaſon to hope; and 'that the evil, which, by his inſtrumentality, is per-'mitted to reign, and prevail in the world, will at 'length terminate in the univerſal good.'

[E] The general prevalence, &c. aſſerted and proved.] In a long Introduction, it is ſhewn, that a critical knowledge of the ſubject may anſwer many valuable purpoſes; and that ſuch a knowledge, in particular, hath a tendency to impreſs us with a due ſenſe of the high importance of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian diſpenſations; and of the pecular propriety of thoſe extraordinary means which were employed to accompliſh our deliverance from Idolatry, and to introduce and eſtabliſh the religions of Moſes and of the Meſſiah. By theſe, and a variety of other introductory remarks, Mr. Farmer juſtifies his attempt to bring forward to the reader a general view of Pagan worſhip, from thoſe records of antiquity, which few have the leiſure or ability to conſult in their original ſtate. In the firſt chapter, he endeavours to prove, by the teſtimonies of the Heathens themſelves, that in the nations ſtyled barbarous, or that were in an uncivilized ſtate, religious honours were paid to dead men. The ſecond chapter carries the enquiry ſtill farther, and abounds with authorities, to ſhew that the caſe was the ſame among the moſt poliſhed nations. Our author, amongſt the nations which anſwer to this deſcription, enumerates the Chaldæans, Babylonians, Syrians, Phœnicians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, learning; but, not being of ſo intereſting a nature to many readers as his former publications, it did not meet with that rapid ſale which he expected. There are in it a number of notes referring to Mr. Fell, and which ſhew Mr. Farmer's ſenſibility to the attack that had been made upon him by that writer. Indeed, we cannot approve of the oblique manner in which ſome of theſe notes are compoſed. It would have been far preferable in our author, either not to have taken any notice of Mr. Fell at all, or to have done it in a more open and manly way. Mr. Fell was not backward in his own vindication. This appeared, in 1785, in a publication, entituled, "The Idolatry of "Greece and Rome diſtinguiſhed from that of other Heathen Nations: in a Letter to "the Reverend Hugh Farmer." At the ſame time that in this tract ample retaliation is made upon Mr. Farmer for his perſonal ſeverities, it appears to us to contain many things, which, if he had continued to publiſh on the ſubject, would have been found deſerving of conſideration and reply. Here cloſes our account of Mr. Farmer as an author from the preſs: for, though he purſued his literary enquiries, and employed himſelf in compoſition, nothing produced by him ever did or (from a circumſtance hereafter to be related) ever can make its public appearance.

We now advert to the remainder of his private life. As a Miniſter he was ſingularly uſeful and ſucceſsful, and he received every mark of honour from the Diſſenters which it was in their power to beſtow. For a great number of years he preached twice a day at Walthamſtow: but a very ingenious and able aſſociate being, at length, provided for him at that place, he acceded after a ſhort interval, to a propoſal that was made to him of becoming afternoon-preacher to the congregation of Salters-hall. This was in the year 1761. At Salters-hall, his labours were as acceptable as they were at Walthamſtow; and indeed his auditory conſtituted the moſt capital afternoon-ſociety that exiſted amongſt the Preſbyterians in the City of London. Some time after this, he was choſen one of the Tueſday-Lecturers at Salters-hall; a tribute of reſpect which is only paid to Miniſters of conſiderable ſtanding in or near the metropolis.

Amidſt Mr. Farmer's employments as a ſcholar, a preacher, and a paſtor, he found leiſure to engage in ſome matters of public buſineſs among the Diſſenters. He was a truſtee of the Rev. Dr. Daniel Williams's various bequeſts; and he was, likewiſe, one of Mr. Coward's truſtees; in which capacity he became a diſpenſer of the large charities that had been left by the gentleman with whom he had been connected in early life. As Mr. Farmer advanced in years, he gradually remitted of his employments as a divine. He reſigned firſt, in 1772, the being afternoon-preacher at Salters-hall; after which, in 1780, he gave up the Tueſday Lectureſhip of the ſame place. In his paſtoral relation at Walthamſtow he continued a few years longer, when he quitted the pulpit entirely. In theſe ſeveral caſes his reſignations were accepted with peculiar regret. After he had ceaſed to be a preacher, it was his general cuſtom to ſpend part of the winter at Bath. Early in 1785, Mr. Farmer was afflicted with almoſt a total failure of ſight; a circumſtance perhaps the more alarming, as his father had been wholly blind ſix years before his death. In this exigence it was neceſſary that our author ſhould ſubmit to a chirurgical operation, which he underwent with great readineſs and fortitude; and by the happy ſkill, firſt of Baron Wenzel, and afterwards of his friend Mr. Wathen, his eyes were reſtored, and he was enabled to purſue his wonted courſe of ſtudy (g). Infirmities growing upon him, he departed this life on the ſixth of February (b), 1787, in the ſeventy-third year of his age; and, agreeably to the directions of his will, was buried in Walthamſtow church-yard, in the ſame grave with his honourable and beloved friends, Mr. and Mrs. Snell. On Sunday, the eighteenth, his funeral ſermon was preached by Mr. Urwick, of Clapham, whoſe diſcourſe was printed. In his laſt will, beſides providing handſomely for his relations, and remembering his ſervants, he left a mans, and ſuch of the Arabians as bordered on Judea and Egypt. It is to the gods of theſe nations, and eſpecially of ſuch of them as bordered on Canaan, that the Scriptures refer when they ſpeak of the heathen deities. Mr. Farmer, therefore, juſtly infers, that the knowledge of the gods of theſe nations muſt be highly uſeful to the lovers of ſacred literature. This leads him into a very ample diſcuſſion of the ſubject, in order to confirm his grand poſition, that, in all the forementioned nations, divine honours were paid to dead men and women. The proofs hitherto produced having chiefly reſpected particular nations, our Author, in the third chapter, offers reaſons of a more general nature in evidence of his main point; reaſons, as he obſerves, which almoſt equally regard the far greater part of the ancient world. Theſe he claſſes under two heads; firſt, thoſe which are drawn from the teſtimonies of the ancients; and, ſecondly, thoſe which are illuſtrated and confirmed by certain uncontroverted facts. The teſtimonies are drawn from the heathen poets—the philoſophers—the hiſtorians—and the Chriſtian fathers. The proofs from facts are the monuments and inſtitutions which were deſigned to perpetuate the heroes who became the objects of Pagan worſhip. Theſe monuments and inſtitutions were the heathen ſepulchres, temples, altars, pyramids, caves, ſtatues, images, ſacrifices, libations, games, feſtivals, myſteries, and many other appendages and ceremonies of ancient ſuperſtition and idolatry. On the whole, Mr. Farmer's arguments go to prove, not only that human ſpirits were generally worſhipped amongſt the heathens, but that ſuch ſpirits alone, or with few exceptions, were, in the nations with which we are beſt acquainted, the direct and immediate objects of the eſtabliſhed worſhip.

In the courſe of the work, our Author has conſidered the ſyſtems of Dr. Blackwell, and Mr. Jacob Bryant; whom he treats with great reſpect, though he differs from them in opinion (4).

hundred pounds to the fund for the widows of Diſſenting Miniſters, and forty pounds to the poor of Walthamſtow pariſh. His regard to the family with which he had ſo long been connected, and to which he had been ſo peculiarly obliged, was teſtified by his bequeathing pecuniary legacies to every member of that family. Smaller legacies were left by him to others of his friends. His executors were William Snell, Eſq. of Clapham, and William Hood, Eſq. of Chancery-lane, barriſter; the firſt the ſon, and the ſecond one of the grandſons, of Mr. Farmer's great patron. To another grandſon, the Rev. Robert Jacomb, our author bequeathed his library, with the exception of ſuch claſſic books as Mr. Snell might ſelect; who alſo was a reſiduary legatee, in conjunction with his ſiſter, Mrs. Hood.

There was one thing in Mr. Farmer's will which requires to be particularly noticed. He makes it his requeſt (for that is the term uſed), that his executors would burn his ſermons and manuſcripts, unleſs he ſhould direct otherwiſe by a ſeparate paper; and, in caſe they ſhould not do it, the legacies of a hundred pounds each, which he had left them, were to be null and void. He had nearly completed a ſecond volume on the demonology of the Ancients, which undoubtedly deſerved to ſee the light. His executors, however, might juſtly eſteem themſelves obliged to comply with his requeſt, with relation to whatever writings had the appearance of not having received his finiſhing hand. But there are two inſtances in which it may be queſtioned whether they did not carry their apprehenſion of what they believed to be their duty to a blameable exceſs, and to what could never rationally be conſidered as part of the intention of the teſtator. He had compoſed a curious diſſertation on the ſtory of Balaam, which he had tranſcribed for the preſs, and for the printing of which he had given his directions. It is not eaſy to conceive that this could be among the papers meant to be deſtroyed. I ſpeak from particular knowledge of the ſubject; the author not only having acquainted Michael Dodſon, Eſq. and myſelf with his purpoſe, but permitted us to read the diſſertation; and that its not having publicly appeared was a loſs to the literary world both of us are highly ſenſible.

The other inſtance is of greater importance, and more to be lamented. Mr. Farmer had made preparations for a ſecond edition of his Treatiſe on Miracles, by which it would have been conſiderably enlarged, and highly improved. Objections would have been anſwered, farther elucidations produced, and the general doctrine of the diſſertation more ſtrongly confirmed. It is ſtill leſs to be ſuppoſed in this caſe than in the former, that it could have been the author's view to have thoſe papers burnt which were intended to give additional perfection to a work that was already before the public. Nor can it be doubted but that theſe papers had a title on the outſide, which would mark the purpoſe they were deſigned to anſwer. We know that the executors were actuated by a ſcrupulous regard to what they believed to be the will of the deceaſed; but it muſt be permitted us to think that they carried their ſcrupuloſity to exceſs. As to the forfeiture that might have been incurred by them, it is not to be mentioned; becauſe the gentlemen, both from their fortunes and characters, were far above paying any regard to ſuch a trifling conſideration.

In an account of Mr. Farmer, his abilities as a preacher muſt not paſs unnoticed. He was particularly excellent in the pulpit. His ſermons were rational, ſpiritual, evangelical, and not unfrequently pathetic. It is juſtly obſerved by Mr. Urwick, that "his "diſcourſes were peculiarly ornamented and enriched with criticiſms for the explana- "tion of different paſſages of ſcripture, or the farther illuſtration of others. Theſe "criticiſms," adds the ſame writer, "were always manly; had evident importance in "them; and, inſtead of being dry and tedious, they much enlivened his ſermons (i)." Mr. Farmer had an admirable talent, without trimming, of pleaſing perſons of very different ſentiments. When he was ſpeaking of the doctrines of the Goſpel, there was a ſwell in his language that looked as if he was riſing to a greater degree of orthodoxy in expreſſion than ſome perſons might approve; but it never came to that point. What he ſaid was always conſiſtent with the moſt liberal ſentiments in matters of Religion. The writer of this article can ſay, from frequent hearing of him, that he was one of the beſt preachers that have appeared among the Proteſtant Diſſenters. "Through all "his public ſervices," ſays Mr. Urwick, "there was a moſt happy variety of thought "and expreſſion, as well as a conſtant flow of lively and humble devotion (k)."

(i) Funeral Sermon for Mr. Farmer, p. 35.

(k) Ibid.

The real excellence of Mr. Farmer's diſcourſes was recommended by the mode in which they were delivered. His voice was clear, ſtrong, flexible, and harmonious. His addreſs was handſome, inſinuating, and diſtinguiſhed by its animation. "Every "one ſaw that he felt the ſentiments which he uttered; and his attentive hearers hap- "pily experienced that he conveyed his own feelings to them (l)." When he had raiſed his voice to a certain pitch, he would happily drop it, in a manner that gave great variety to his elocution, and which had a powerful effect. In converſation he was lively and brilliant to an uncommon degree. Mr. Urwick obſerves, that in this reſpect he bore a ſtrong reſemblance to his amiable tutor. "They both poſſeſſed a ſtrength

" of underſtanding that ſuſtained the labour of cloſe ſtudy and difficult inveſtigation; " and yet retained that livelineſs and flexibility of mind, which rendered them highly " entertaining in the moſt gay and exhilarating converſation, where the mirth was in- " nocent (m)." To this account it may be added, that, like Doddridge, Mr. Farmer ſometimes went far enough in his complimentary language to perſons preſent. He was, likewiſe, very backward in readily declaring his ſentiments, when aſked them, concerning particular topics, living writers, or recent publications. Any queſtion of this kind not unfrequently produced from him, what has been aſcribed to the Quakers, another queſtion in return. He had great ſenſibility of temper. It was probably ſome feeling of his laſt work's not having met with the attention he expected, which dictated the order concerning the burning of his manuſcripts. If the natural warmth of his ſpirit occaſionally led him into any little impropriety of ſpeech or behaviour, he was afterwards ſolicitous to make every proper conceſſion, and was not eaſy till the offence was quite cleared away. In his regular deportment he was in the higheſt degree kind and obliging (n). It is ſcarcely neceſſary to ſay of Mr. Farmer that he was free from religious bigotry. His temper was too liberal, his underſtanding too enlarged, and his acquaintance with the world too extenſive, to permit him to be the ſlave of ſo baſe a principle. In the freeſt converſation with regard to ſects and parties of Chriſtians, he was never heard to utter a ſevere or uncandid thing of any ſet of men or opinions whatſoever (o).

The piety of our author was unqueſtionable. It was ſincere and ardent; and his love to God was accompanied with love to man. He had great generoſity of diſpoſition, and in his diſtributions to charitable deſigns and objects went to the utmoſt extent of his circumſtances. To the poor and diſtreſt he was a conſtant and bountiful benefactor. On the whole, viewing Mr. Farmer in his private character and public endowments; conſidering him as a man, a miniſter, a ſcholar, and an author, it may juſtly be aſſerted, that he ſuſtained a high rank among the Diſſenting Clergy of his time, and ſupported an honourable ſtation in the literature of the age.] K.

 [FARNABIE, or FARNABY (THOMAS), a learned Grammarian, who has found a place in Bayle's Dictionary, and Niceron's Memoirs of illuſtrious men, ought not to be omitted in the Biographia Britannica. He was born in London about the year 1575. His father was a carpenter in that city; his grandfather had been Mayor of Truro in Cornwall; and his great-grandfather was an Italian muſician, who had ſettled in England. After having received a proper grammatical education, he was admitted of Merton-College, Oxford, in the beginning of the year 1590, where he became Servitor to Mr. Thomas French, Fellow of that College, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a youth of lively parts and great hopes. Being, however, of an unſettled diſpoſition, he abruptly quitted the Univerſity, and, abandoning both his religion and his country, paſſed over to Spain, and was for ſome time educated there in a certain college belonging to the Jeſuits. At length, growing weary of the ſevere diſcipline of the inſtitution, he found a way to leave it, and went with Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins in their laſt voyage, in 1595. By the former of theſe great naval commanders he is ſaid to have been held in ſome eſteem. Mr. Farnaby is afterwards reported to have ſerved as a ſoldier in the Low Countries. No advantage was gained by him in theſe expeditions; for, having been reduced to much diſtreſs, he landed in Cornwall, and from the urgency of his neceſſities was obliged to deſcend to the humble employment of teaching children their horn-book. Whilſt he was in this low ſituation he did not chuſe to go by his own name, but changed it to Thomas Bainrafe, the anagram of Farnabie. By degrees he roſe to thoſe higher occupations of a ſchool-maſter for which he was ſo well qualified. After ſome time, he fixed at Martock in Somerſetſhire, where he taught a grammar-ſchool with great ſucceſs. In 1646, when Mr. Charles Darby was called to teach the ſame ſchool, he found in that town, and the neighbourhood, many perſons who had been Mr. Farnaby's ſcholars, and who, in their grey hairs, were ingenious men and good grammarians. From Martock Mr. Farnaby removed to London, and opened a ſchool in Goldſmiths-Rents, behind Red-Croſs-ſtreet, near Cripplegate, where were large gardens and handſome houſes, together with all the accommodations proper for the young noblemen and gentlemen committed to his care. So eſtabliſhed was his reputation, that at one time the number of his ſcholars amounted to more than three hundred. Whilſt he was at the head of this ſchool, he was created Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and on the twenty-fourth of April, 1616, was incorporated to the ſame degree at Oxford (a).

(a) Great General Dictionary, Vol. V. p. 189, 190. Wood's Athenæ Oxonienſes, Vol. II. p. 104. Ibid, Vol. I. Faſti, p. 292.

After a courſe of years, on account of ſome differences with his landlords, and the frequent ſickneſſes which occurred in the city, Mr. Farnaby determined to quit London. This was in 1636. The place which he choſe for his reſidence was Sevenock in Kent, in the neighbourhood of which town (at Otford) he had purchaſed an eſtate. Here he renewed his former occupation, and, from the number of Noblemen's and

Gentlemen's ſons who boarded with him, grew ſo rich as to add conſiderably to his landed property. One of the eſtates purchaſed by him was near Horſham in Suſſex. His works, an account of which will be given below, have tranſmitted his name with honour to poſterity [A]. They were not only well received at home but abroad, and have been applauded by ſeveral eminent foreign ſcholars. Bayle obſerves, that Mr. Farnaby's notes upon moſt of the eminent Latin poets have been of very great uſe to young beginners; and that they are ſhort, learned, and deſigned chiefly to clear up the text. A French Dominican Frier, in a paſſage in which he undertakes to prove that the Jeſuits are much below a great many other writers, who have illuſtrated the Belles Lettres, hath thus commended the works of our author. "I am ſorry, that in "my time, when I ſtudied polite literature, we wanted this great aſſiſtance to improve "ourſelves in it, which, ſince a few years, Farnaby and others have afforded. For "they have explained all the poets in ſo clear a manner by their marginal notes; that "a man but indifferently ſkilled in the grammar can go eaſily through the moſt dif- "ficult paſſages. Theſe helps towards underſtanding the ancient authors cannot be "expected from, nor procured by, them that teach polite literature only for three or "four years, and then are promoted to a Profeſſorſhip of Divinity or Philoſophy, but "only by thoſe who ſpend all their life-time, and even die in a grammar-ſchool. "Such were, I am ſure, thoſe who by their marginal commentaries have afforded "ſuch an uſeful and neceſſary aſſiſtance for the ſtudy of polite literature (b)." The

The third edition was printed at London, in 1620, under the following title: "Junii Juvenalis et Auli Perſii Flacci Satyræ: "cum Annotationibus ad Marginem, quæ obſcuriſ- "ſima quæque dilucidare poſſint. Tertia Editio, "prioribus multo emendatior et auctior." The book is dedicated to Henry Prince of Wales, who received the author very kindly, and in ſome meaſure commanded him to write ſuch comments on all the Latin poets. 'But he was ſo vexed,' ſays Bayle, 'at the 'cenſures of ſeveral critics, that out of ſpite, and 'againſt his own inclination, he was reſolved to diſ- 'continue that kind of labour.' He was perſuaded, however, to alter his reſolution (1). Ben Jonſon wrote the following epigram upon his notes on Juvenal:

Poſt omnes omnium "Editiones Recenſioneſque Editio tertia auctior et "emendatior, Operâ et Studio Thomæ Farnabii." To this edition is prefixed a privilege granted him from the King, dated October, 1634, for the ſole printing of that, and ſeveral other of his works, for one-and-twenty years. The book is accompanied with commendatory verſes, by Daniel Heinſius, Richard Andrews, M. D. Hugh Holland, Laurence Whitaker, and Na. Tomkins. III. "Notæ ad Mar- "tialis Epigrammata." Lond. 1615, in octavo. Other editions, in 12mo. were afterwards printed, both at London and Geneva. Theſe notes were dedicated to Sir Robert Killegrew. IV. V. "Index Rhetoricus Scholis et Inſtitutioni tene- "rioris Ætatis accommodatus." Lond. 1625, in octavo. To an edition publiſhed in the ſame city, in 1646, were added, "Formulæ Oratoriæ et Index "Poeticus." The fifth edition was printed at London, in 1654, under the following title. "Index "Rhetoricus et Oratorius, Scholis et Inſtitutioni "tenerioris Ætatis accommodatus. Cui adjiciuntur "Formulæ Oratoriæ et Index Poeticus. Operâ et "Studio Thomæ Farnabii. Editio quinta, prioribus "emendatior." This book is dedicated to Dominico Molino, Senator of Venice. The Index Poeticus, annexed to this, was firſt printed at London, in 1634. In the Preface to the "Index Rhetoricus," Mr. Farnaby informs his Readers, that he had pub- liſhed, about twenty years before, his Scheme of Tropes, in verſe, without his name; which, meeting with ſucceſs, was claimed by a certain plagiary; upon which our Author compoſed his "Index Rhe- "toricus." Monſ. Gibert ſpeaks of this work with commendation, and obſerves that Monſ. Baillet has paſſed a favourable judgment upon it. Father Vavaſſeur, though he affirms that Mr. Farnaby's Latin is ſometimes exceptionable, allows him, never- theleſs to have been a diligent and learned writer. VI. "Florilegium Epigrammatum Græcorum, eorum- "que Latino Verſu a variis redditorum." London, 1629, in octavo, &c. VII. "Notæ ad Virgilium." London, 1634, in octavo. VIII. "Syſtema Gram- "maticum." London, 1641, in octavo. King Charles the Firſt ordered Mr. Farnaby to write a Latin Grammar, for the uſe of all the ſchools, when that which had been eſtabliſhed by law, and againſt which many complaints had been made, was to be reformed. IX. "Notæ in Ovidii Metamorphoſes." Paris, 1637, in folio; and London, in 12mo. 1677, &c. X. "Phraſiologia Anglo-Latina." London, in octavo. XI. "Tabulæ Græcæ Linguæ." London, in Quarto. XII. "Syntaxis." London, in octavo. XIII. "Notæ in Terentium." Our Author had finiſhed his notes upon Terence only as far as the fourth Comedy, when he was cut off by death. But Dr. Meric Caſaubon completed the two laſt comedies, and publiſhed the whole, in 12mo. at London, in 1651 (2). Anthony Wood hath added to the cata- logue, "Epiſtolæ variæ ad doctiſſimos Viros." But this article does not refer to a diſtinct publication, but to the letters occaſionally written by Farnaby to learned men, and particularly to Voſſius.

teſtimonies

teſtimonies of other writers to Mr. Farnaby's merit may be ſeen in the note. When the civil commotions broke out, in 1641, our author was eſteemed to be ill affected to the Parliament, becauſe, on occaſion of the proteſtation's being urged that year, he had ſaid, that "it was better to have one King than five hundred." Being afterwards ſuſpected of having favoured the riſing of the county for the King about Tunbridge, in 1643, he was impriſoned in Newgate, and thence carried on ſhipboard. It was even debated in the Houſe of Commons whether he ſhould be ſent to America; but this motion being rejected, he was removed to Ely-Houſe in Holborn, where he remained for a conſiderable time. It is inſinuated by Anthony Wood, that ſome of the members of both houſes, who had been his ſcholars, were amongſt thoſe who urged his being treated with ſeverity. But, if this was the caſe, they either were guilty of the moſt ſhameful ingratitude, or our ſchool-maſter muſt have been very deficient in the art of attaching the affections of his pupils. Mr. Farnaby departed this life on the twelfth of June, 1647, aged ſeventy-two, and was interred in the Chancel of the Church at Sevenock. Over his grave an epitaph was inſcribed, which is as follows: "P. M. Viri ornatiſſimi Thomæ Farnabii Armigeri, olim Regiæ Reique "publicæ, ſed literariæ, Vindicis acerrimi.

"Vatibus hic ſacris qui Lux, Farnabius, olim
"Vate carens, Saxo nunc ſine Luce jacet."

Our author was twice married. His firſt wife was Suſanna, daughter of John Pierce, of Launcells, in Cornwall, Gent. By her he had a ſon named John, who became a Captain in King Charles's army, and inherited his father's eſtate in Suſſex, where he lived in good eſteem, and died about the beginning of the year 1673. Mr. Farnaby's ſecond wife was Anne, the daughter of Dr. John Howſon, Biſhop of Durham, by whom he had ſeveral children. One of them, Francis, ſucceeded to his father's eſtate at Kippington, in the pariſh of Sevenock. From this gentleman Anthony Wood derived his information concerning the particulars of our famous ſchool-maſter's life. According to the Oxford Antiquary, Farnaby was the chief Grammarian, Rhetorician, Poet, Latiniſt, and Grecian, of his time. This muſt be confeſſed to be the language of exaggeration. Wood adds, that his ſchool was ſo much frequented, that more Churchmen and Stateſmen iſſued from it, than from any ſchool taught by one man in England (c).] K.

FARQUHAR (GEORGE), an ingenious comic Poet, in the latter end of King William's reign, and part of Queen Anne's, was deſcended of a good family in the North of Ireland, where, it is ſaid, his parents held no mean rank (a). We have been informed, by a gentleman of that country, that his father was Dean of Armagh, but have not met with it confirmed: however, it is atteſted by another of his countrymen, that he was the ſon of a clergyman, and born at Londonderry, in that kingdom; which was in the year 1678, as may be computed from his account of him (b). There he received his more juvenile inſtruction; and there he diſcovered a genius, ſo nearly devoted to the Muſes, that unleſs he is complimented, as he intimates Poets often by themſelves are, with being the authors of ripe fruits in their greeneſt years, he gave ſeveral ſpecimens of his poetry before he was ten years old, in which he manifeſted a depth of thinking, as well as an elegancy of expreſſion, far beyond his years; one example whereof, being preſerved by the writer of his memoirs above quoted, may alſo, in this account of ours, be thought not unworthy of preſervation [A]. We receive it from the ſame hand, that his parents, having a numerous iſſue, could beſtow on him no fortune farther than a genteel education; therefore, when he was qualified for the Univerſity, he was ſent to Trinity-College in Dublin; which, as we are elſewhere informed, was in 1694, he being then in the ſeventeenth year of his age (c). Here, by the progreſs he made in his ſtudies, he acquired a conſiderable reputation (d); but we find it not conſented to, that he there took his degree of Bachelor of Arts (e);

[A] May in this account be thought not unworthy of preſervation.] This early production of our author's, which has indeed in it ſomething beyond the years in which it is ſaid to be written, is as follows:

The pliant ſoul of erring youth
Is like ſoft wax or moiſten'd clay;
Apt to receive all heav'nly truth,
Or yield to tyrant Ill the ſway.

Slight folly in your early years
At manhood may to virtue riſe;
But he, who in his youth appears
A fool, in age will ne'er be wiſe (1).

However, our author himſelf reflects upon the aſcribing ſome compoſitions to ingenious men in their green years, or their pretending to have written them before they did; as if it were not only neceſſary, but might be diſadvantageous, through the extraordinary expectations it might raiſe of proportionable improvements in their riper productions: ſo extenuate the character it was intended to magnify; where he brings in Poet Lyric, ſaying to his correſpondent, 'Now, Sir, here's a poem, which, according to the 'way of us Poets, I ſay, was written at fifteen; but, 'between you and I, it was made at five and 'twenty (2).'

for,

for, indeed, his gay and volatile diſpoſition, could not long reliſh the grave and regular courſe of a collegiate life; and his own opinion of it, to that ſenſe, he afterwards freely enough diſplayed in ſeveral parts of his comedies, and other writings: beſides, the expence of it, without any immediate proſpect of ſome profitable returns, might be inconſiſtent with his circumſtances. The more polite and popular entertainments of the town moſt attracted him, eſpecially thoſe of the ſtage; and he does not ſeem to have been in that college much above a year, or two at moſt, before he perceived ſome hopeful temptation of tranſplanting himſelf thither, from the encouragement he ſaw others receive. For, when Mr. Joſeph Aſhbury, the maſter of Dublin Theatre, had carried thither from England, among others, to recruit his company of players, Mr. Robert Wilks, who had been, from the latter end of the year 1690, till his ſaid return into Ireland (f), under Mr. Chriſtopher Rich, at Drury-lane houſe, though very little to his advantage; but was now, at Dublin, much advanced in his ſalary, and much more careſſed by his own countrymen than he had been at London, as we have it in another life of Mr. Wilks, different from that laſt quoted (g); Mr. Farquhar ſoon found alſo his own perſon, and his parts, being already known by ſome of his poetical performances, ſo recommend him to that maſter, or this player, that, by the voluntary choice of the one, or cordial intereſt of the other, he was readily admitted into the ſaid theatre; but his ſervices there were of no long continuance. It is indeed reported, that his genteel figure, proper geſture, ready memory, and juſt elocution, rendered him very acceptable there; only his voice, which, either in ſpeaking or ſinging, among private company, made him alſo, as we have been informed by thoſe who knew him, very engaging, was too mild, too low, in thoſe public and numerous aſſemblies. In ſhort, he could not rant and rave, and tear a paſſion to tatters, as Shakeſpeare phraſes it (h); or captivate the commonalty of an audience, which is raviſhed more with ſound than ſenſe: and might poſſibly want, like Thomas Otway and Nat. Lee (i), that front or aſſurance, that conceit or ſelf-ſufficiency, which diſguiſes defects and improprieties, both in ſpeech and action; overbears the generality of ſpectators; and carries many veteran ſtagers plauſibly through thoſe parts, which they are unqualified naturally to perſonate. His more excellent talents, however, might have preſerved the Player at Dublin, and loſt the Poet at London, but for an accident, whereby he was near turning a feigned tragedy into a real one [B]; which, being ſo repugnant to his inherent humanity, added to his other diſcouragement; and this happening at the time when Mr. Wilks received a more profitable propoſal than he expected, from Mr. Rich aforeſaid, of four pounds a week, if he would return, with his wife, to the Engliſh ſtage, it was with the leſs difficulty that Mr. Farquhar was perſuaded to bear them company (k). After their arrival at London, which might be in the year 1696 (l), Mr. Wilks, who was well acquainted with his abilities, ceaſed not his importunities, till he had prevailed with him to write a play (m); aſſuring him, that he was beheld, by all who knew him, in a much brighter light than he had opportunity hitherto of ſhewing himſelf, and was fitter to exhibit entertaining compoſitions for the ſtage than to echo thoſe of other Poets upon it. But he was more ſubſtantially invited yet by a genteel and decent accommodation, which would enable him, both with means and leiſure, to exerciſe his genius at eaſe in the ſtudy of dramatic poetry; for, we are told, it was not very long after that accident at the Play-houſe in Dublin, before the Earl of Orrery, who was a patron as a well as maſter of learning, in regard to his ſingular merits, which he ſaw hitherto unrewarded, gave him a Lieutenant's commiſſion in his own regiment, then in Ireland, which he held ſeveral years (n). From the former of which authorities, here referred to, we alſo learn, that, as an officer of the ſaid rank in the army, he behaved himſelf very commendably, and gave ſeveral proofs both of his courage andconduct. Whether this commiſſion was conferred upon him before or after he obliged the town with his firſt comedy, we are not particularly informed; and authors differ in their nomination of the firſt play that Mr. Wilks performed in upon his return to the Engliſh ſtage. Whether he acted the part of Palamede (o), as it had been affirmed by one of our dramatic hiſtorians (p), or that of Armuſia (q), according to the aſſertion of another (r), is not here very material: but we have, among Mr. Farquhar's Miſcellanies, an Epilogue of his writing, which was ſpoken by Mr. Wilks at his firſt appearance, as it is ſaid, upon the Engliſh ſtage (s); which we take to be rather this his firſt appearance upon his return thither, un-leſs it may be urged, that our author, who wrote ſuch verſes as are before quoted, at ten years of age, might very well write theſe at twelve or thirteen. In the year 1698, his firſt comedy, called "Love and a Bottle," appeared on the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane, and it was, as well for the ſprightly dialogue as that lively turn of incidents in it which fill the ſtage with buſineſs and keep up the ſpirit of ſuch compoſitions, very well received, though Mr. Wilks had no part in it. In 1699, the late celebrated Mrs. Anne Oldfield, was, upon his judgment and recommendation, firſt admitted into the ſaid theatre [C], ſhe then being ſixteen years of age (t): and, in the former part of the year 1700, he brought his "Conſtant Couple or Trip to the Jubilee," upon that ſtage, it being then the Jubilee year at Rome, when ſome Popiſh zealots, of all countries made their trip thither, to buy pardons and other trinkets or fairings, for the convenience of ſoul and body. But our author drew ſuch a gay airy figure in Sir Harry Wildair, the part was ſo perfectly adapted to Mr. Wilks's genius, and it was ſo animated by his geſture and vivacity of ſpirit, that it is not determinable whether the Poet or the Player received more reputation by it. Towards the latter end of this year we meet with Mr. Farquhar in Holland, probably upon his military duty; whence he has given a deſcription, in two of his letters, dated in Auguſt and October that year, from the Brill and from Leyden, no leſs equitable than facetious, as well of thoſe places, as the people (u); and, in a third, dated from the Hague, in the ſame month laſt mentioned, he very humouroufly relates how merry he was there, at a treat made by the Earl of Weſtmoreland; while, not only himſelf, but King William, and others of his ſubjects, were detained there by a violent ſtorm, which he has no leſs comically deſcribed (w); and has, among his poems, written alſo an ingenious copy of verſes to his miſtreſs upon the ſame ſubject. Whether this miſtreſs was the ſame perſon whom he calls his charming Penelope, in ſeveral of his love-letters addreſſed to her, and ſome others probably in which ſhe is not ſo called, we know not; but have been informed, by an old officer of the army, who very well knew Mr. Farquhar, and ſome of his youthful gallantries, that by that name we are to underſtand Miſs Oldfield, above mentioned; and that the perſon meant by Mrs. V————, in one of them, ſaid to be her bedfellow (x), was Mrs. Verbruggen the actreſs, the ſame who was ſome years before Mrs. Mountfort (y), from whom Mrs. Oldfield received her firſt theatrical inſtructions, and ſucceeded, when ſhe died three or four years after in childbed, in her principal parts, with ſingular commendation: and we ſhall ſee preſently, how comfortably Mr. Farquhar could warm his fancy, and chafe up his inclinations, at this bright ſparkling flame of his: whence we need not doubt what another perſon, who was acquainted alſo with her, has ſaid in theſe words: "I have often heard Mrs. Oldfield mention the many agreeable hours ſhe had ſpent in Mr. Farquhar's company (z)." But here Chronology calls upon us, for the ſpace of a few lines, to order. In the beginning of the following year, he was a ſpectator of, if not a mourner at, Mr. Dryden's funeral; but the deſcription he has made of it is indeed no mournful one (a). And now his laſt comedy having met with almoſt unparalleled ſucceſs, and ſo charmed the whole town that nothing could reliſh like a continuation of it, he accordingly, in that year, 1701, brought out his comedy called "Sir Harry Wildair, &c." and, when Mrs. Oldfield came to ſhine out, equal with Wilks, in thoſe two plays, there was none at that time which more attracted the gay company at leaſt, which frequented the Theatre, or more engaged their approbation. Of theſe three comedies, hitherto ſpoken of, we ſhall ſay ſomething more hereafter, with his others, in a note together.

[B] He was near turning a feigned tragedy into a real one.] This ſtory we find related after this manner; 'Mr. Farquhar was extremely beloved in Ireland, and had indeed the advantage of a very good perſon, though his voice was weak; but as he never met with the leaſt repulſe from the audience, in any of his performances, he was reſolved to continue on the ſtage till ſomething better ſhould offer; but his reſolution was ſoon broke by an accident. For, Mr. Farquhar being to play the part of Guyomar (3), who kills Vaſquez, one of the Spaniſh Generals, and forgetting to exchange his ſword for a foil, in the engagement he wounded his brother-tragedian, who repreſented Vaſquez, very dangerouſly; and, though it proved not mortal, yet it ſo ſhocked the natural tenderneſs of Mr. Farquhar's temper, that it put a period to his acting ever after (4).'

SIR,

'In your Memoirs of Mrs. Oldfield it may not be 'amiſs to inſert the following facts, on the truth of 'which you may depend. Her father, Capt. Oldfield, 'not only ran out all the military but likewiſe the 'paternal bounds of his fortune, having a pretty eſtate 'in houſes in Pall-Mall. It was wholly owing to Capt. 'Farquhar that ever Mrs. Oldfield became an actreſs, 'from the following incident. Dining one day at her 'aunt's, who kept the Mitre Tavern in St. James's, 'Market (*), he heard Miſs Nanny read a play be-'hind the bar, with ſo proper an emphaſis, and ſuch 'agreeable turns, ſuitable to each character, that he 'ſwore the girl was cut out for the ſtage, to which ſhe 'had before always expreſſed an inclination, being 'very deſirous to try her fortune that way. Her mo-'ther, the next time ſhe ſaw Capt. Vanbrugh, who 'had a great reſpect for the family, told him what 'was Capt. Farquhar's advice; upon which, he deſired 'to know whether, in the plays ſhe read, her fancy 'was moſt pleaſed with tragedy or comedy? Miſs being 'called in, ſaid comedy; ſhe having, at that time, 'gone through all Beaumont and Fletcher's comedies; 'and the play ſhe was reading, when Capt. Farquhar 'dined there, was, "The Scornful Lady." Capt. 'Vanbrugh, ſhortly after, recommended her to Mr. 'Chriſtopher Rich, who took her into the houſe, at 'the allowance of but fifteen ſhillings per week. How-'ever, her agreeable figure, and the ſweetneſs of her 'voice, ſoon gave her the preference, in the opinion 'of the whole town, to all our young actreſſes; and 'his Grace the late Duke of Bedford being pleaſed 'to ſpeak to Mr. Rich in her favour, he inſtantly 'raiſed her allowance to twenty ſhillings per week: 'her fame and ſalary, at length, roſe to her juſt 'merit.

(*) It was then kept by Mrs. Voſs.

(6) Mrs. Cath. Trotter, printed 4to, 1698; which Gildon thinks deſerves the Applauſe it met with. His Dramatic Poets, in Append. p. 179.

His letters, as we obſerved, were written in 1700 and 1701. Some, when he was in Holland; and the reſt, when he was returned to England; of which we have mentioned ſome chief parts relating to his perſonal hiſtory, but the greateſt number contains his courtſhip and amours with one or two of the fair ſex; ſome, dated from Gray's-Inn; others, from the Inner-Temple, and ſome part of Eſſex, when he was in the country. In one of his amorous letters, containing a 'conteſt between his head and his heart,' in which the latter, by the help of ſome other members, gets the better in the concluſion, which is ſlily witty and waggiſh, there runs, throughout, ſuch a ſingular vein of humour and drollery, that we may take it for a comedy in miniature (7). In another, his diſtinctions upon thoſe female maxims of amorous policy, aſſerting, that, 'if the women will fly, the men will 'purſue;' and that 'enjoyment quenches love;' with his arguments againſt 'the inconſiſtence of love 'with reaſon,' he has, like an honourable lover, ingeniouſly defeated thoſe tyrannical and heterodox principles in the fair ſex, and attempted to introduce a reformed ſyſtem in their doctrine of love; by diſtinguiſhing, like a man of ſenſe, what only is the paſſion of fools (8). But among his letters to his dear Penelope, or Mrs. Oldfield, as it is reported, that above referred to, in which Mrs. Verbruggen is affirmed to be mentioned, concludes with his verſes upon Roſamond's Pond in St. James's Park, and the Water-rat which had frighted his charmer aforeſaid, away from the banks of it, in theſe words:

But his letter and dialogue, written to the ſame perſon, as it is ſaid, from Gray's-Inn, 'upon her 'wearing her maſk' the evening before; which was a female faſhion in thoſe days, as well in public walks as among the ſpectators at the playhouſe, becauſe they ſo naturally diſplay his pleaſant temper and talents, and will afford an idea of them as clear as moſt of the reſt, therefore may not be thought tedious to repeat, eſpecially as they are all that we ſhall revive out of this collection, are as follow:

'The arguments you made uſe of laſt night for 'keeping on your maſk, I endeavoured to defeat with 'reaſon; but, that proving ineffectual, I'll try the force 'of rhyme, and ſend you the heads of our chat in a 'Poetical Dialogue between You and I.'

This collection of Poems, Letters, &c. is dedicated by our Author to Edmund Chaloner, Eſq. an ingenious admirer of the Muſes, eſpecially that of Mr. Farquhar; and a deſcendent of the famous Sir Thomas Chaloner, who was himſelf a man of diſtinguiſhed wit and learning in his time; alſo a ſoldier as well as a poet, like Mr. Farquhar; who has therein not only celebrated the virtuous qualities and accompliſhments of his patron, in a very polite manner, but ſhewed, in the example of that anceſtor, how harmoniouſly Mars and Minerva may combine, or make a moſt illuſtrious union in one perſon. How dangerouſly that brave anceſtor eſcaped death, when ſhipwrecked by the ſtorm that defeated the expedition of Charles the Emperor againſt the Algerines; when he caught, and held faſt in his mouth, the cable that ſaved his life, with the loſs of his teeth: how bravely he purchaſed the honour of being made Knight-Banneret in the field: How diſcreetly he diſcharged his embaſſy to Philip II. of Spain: how learnedly he wrote ſeveral books in proſe and verſe, ſome of which made even the grave Lord Burghley, a Latin Poet as well as himſelf, in his commendation, may not only be ſeen partly in this dedication, but more largely elſewhere (10); while here we proceed to obſerve that our Author, among other agreeable addreſſes to his Reader, in the Preface of this Collection, ſays very jocoſely of himſelf, as to his equipments, or ſtock and change of apparel or furniture for his underſtanding, that truly 'this gentleman is of ſome circumſtance and 'condition, and has not been engaged in the ſhifts 'that ſome late ſparks were put to for their habili-'ments, who ferret all the wit-brokers in town; ta-'ken up from ſeveral places, and ſtrut in a ſecond-'hand finery, patched up of the ſcraps and remnants of 'the requeſt, by one of his female correſpondents, as appears therein (c), who was, as it is reported, the ſaid Mrs. Oldfield; and ſhe often delighted to read them, many years after they were printed; as ſhe alſo did, that Eſſay at the end of them, which is called "A Diſcourſe upon Comedy, in reference to the Engliſh Stage; which, as it is both very entertaining and expreſſive of our author's ſentiments upon this ſubject, a few extracts thereof may not, in this article, be unwelcome [E]. But what may give a more

'the eminent men of the age; for, I muſt tell you, Sir, 'though his cloaths be but plain, yet they are his 'own, taken up handſomely at one place, where he 'may have credit for as much more when theſe are 'worn out.' It were eaſy, by many inſtances, in theſe letters, &c. to point out the great ſpirit of vivacity and volubility in his thoughts; his droll and ſportive, his lepid and ludicrous, vein: and, in his ſtyle, ſometimes quaint, ſometimes florid, often comprehenſive and compact, ſome turns both of period and expreſſion, inclining to the elegant and ſententious, but commonly, through a humour naturally chearful, free and debonnair, not only pithy and poignant, but pleaſing and perſuaſive. Had the ſun-ſhine of his wit not been clouded ſo ſoon, but ſuffered by Death to have run a longer courſe, it would probably have brought to maturity ſuch richer fruits of more ſolid and ſerious ſubjects as would have preferred themſelves to the nicer and more exquiſite taſte of the moſt mature, ſerious, and ſolid, readers. But, in leſs than two years after the ſaid intercourſe of amorous epiſtles, Mr. Farquhar was diverted from the publication of any more by another fair lady, who fell in love with him; and, fearing no other impediment to her deſires of ſecuring him to herſelf than the ſlenderneſs of her circumſtances, ſo contrived, that they were repreſented to him much more conſiderable than he at laſt found them. So he thought, before this diſcovery, that, if Cupid's fire-arms would ſo effectually wound, when but ſingly loaden with the charming image of the fair, wherewith he had before been ſo deeply ſmitten, it were in vain now to think of eſcaping them when doubly charged, with beauty and fortune too. In ſhort, it ſeems his own inclination, as well as the proſpect of advantage, led him chearfully into the bands of matrimony; and we hear nothing to the contrary but they made a Conſtant Couple: nor is it otherwiſe objected to him by the Poet who gave this unneceſſary caution,

Bid Farquhar, though bit, to his confort be juſt(11).

For, her affection ſo engaged his good nature, that he forgot the thoughts of that diſappointment; till afterwards another, from a noble, or rather titled, courtier, left him to increaſe the number of thoſe examples, which may convince the credulous, without the expence of a trial, that there may be ſome deluſions in friendſhip more fatal than thoſe in love.

[E] A few extracts thereof may not, in this article, be unwelcome.] This "Diſcourſe upon Comedy," in reference to the "Engliſh Stage," which is the laſt, printed in his collection of Letters beforementioned, conſiſting of about twenty-ſix pages, ſeems, by his mentioning at the entrance his three firſt plays, to have been written in 1701. The uncommon ſucceſs which thoſe plays met with having nettled ſome of the waſpiſh critics, and provoked them to exert their little ſtings, he wrote it in juſtification of thoſe moderate irregularities, and other tolerable or compenſing liberties he had taken in them; but his allegations for them are ſo agreeably or plauſibly rational, that it is no wonder Mrs. Oldfield ſhould preſer ſome parts thereof, as the moſt humourous of all other apologies for licence in this ſpecies (12) of the drama, equal to what is granted in all other branches of poetry, even though ſhe had no previous impreſſion, from his engaging converſation, of partiality in his favour. For, in ſome places, his ſtyle and ſentiments are ſo adapted to his ſubject, and, againſt the auſterity of critical rules for the compoſition of comedy, are ſo comically diſplayed, that he has left even thoſe pleaſed, whom he might not leave perſuaded; and, in other parts, his ironical praiſe of ancient rules, for all ſyſtems of advice or reprehenſion, in our modern modes of corruption and vanity, contains ſome of the moſt delicate and refined ſpirit of antient ſatire. Indeed, he had briefly and blithly enough given us an abſtract of the uſual ſubject-matter both in Tragedy and Comedy before, in a parly between Lovewell and Lyric, the Poet, after this manner:

(12) Life of Mrs. Oldfield, p. 49.

Love. What reliſh have you for Comedy?

Lyric. No ſatisfactory one—My curioſity is foreſtalled by a fore-knowledge of what ſhall happen: for, as the Hero in Tragedy is either a whining, cringing fool, that's always a ſtabbing himſelf; or a ranting hectoring bully, that's for killing every body elſe; ſo the Hero in Comedy is always the Poet's own Character (13).

Love. What's that?

Lyric. A compound of practical rake and ſpeculative gentleman, who always bears off the great fortune in the play, and ſhams off the Beau and Squire with a whore or chambermaid: and, as the cataſtrophe of all Tragedies is Death, ſo the end of Comedies is Marriage.

Love. And ſome think that the moſt tragical concluſion of the two, &c. (14).

But here, in this profeſſed diſcourſe upon comedy before us, our author ſaw reaſon to be more copious and explicit upon the topic; though, after all, when he comes to its definition, he makes no formal myſtery or frightful intricacy in it, but very freely and ſimply explains it to be no more at preſent than 'a well-'framed tale, handſomely told, as an agreeable vehicle 'for cenſure or reproof:' which for ſenſible men, qualified to uſe it, may be an explanation particular enough, and, for ſtupid ones, any other which is more particular would be only more puzzling. Among the points of doctrine laid down in this comic creed, or plan of his dramatic principles, we find not that he would have any other Poet, more than himſelf, ignorant of the criticks rules, or is againſt their being read; but, after that, he would have an able genius follow his own, or conform himſelf occaſionally to thoſe which are moſt ſuitable to his preſent ſubject, and ſuch perſons, as are to be inſtructed or entertained by it. He laments, that poetry alone, of all other profeſſions, and chiefly the Drama, lies open to the inſults of all pretenders, and that this kind, of all others, muſt ſubmit to ſuch a variety of unequal judges. He allows, without diſpute, that an author muſt endeavour to pleaſure that part of the audience who can lay the beſt claim to a judicious and impartial reflection; but deſires he would firſt conſider, to what diviſion that claim does moſt properly belong, though he foreſees that ſcholars will be angry with him for making this the ſubject of a queſtion; yet will not allow that ſuch meer readers of ancient authors in their antient languages are the better ſort of judges in this caſe. However, he allows one of theſe profound ſcholaſtics, after having turned through Ariſtotle, and all the old criticks, to have formed a regular play, with a ſingle plot, without ſong or dance, circumſcribed to three hours, and unity of place, with the allowance of an hundred and fifty pounds to dreſs; then, after all, the meager empty thing, blown up indeed with windy words, is found by the player to have no more operative matter for him to ſhew his art upon than a carpenter can find in a piece of ſteel: 'Here is the lamp and the ſcho-'lar in every line, but not a ſyllable of the Poet: 'here is elaborate language, ſounding epithets, flights 'of words that ſtrike the clouds, while the poor ſenſe 'lags after, like the lantern in the tail of a kite, 'which appears only like a ſtar, while the breath of 'the players' lungs has ſtrength to bear it up in the 'air.'——So that, 'the audience, not meeting the 'diverſion they expected on the ſtage, ſhift for them-'ſelves in the pit; every one turns about to his neigh-'bour in a maſk, and, for default of entertainment 'now, they ſtrike up for more diverting ſcenes when 'the play is done: and, though the play be regular as 'Ariſtotle,

(13) Which, by the way, is allowed to have been his own practice in this very play, and others; and, indeed, in divers places, when any thing in another is to undergo the diſcipline of ridicule, he very generouſly makes free with ſomething of his own to partake of it.

more natural and lively repreſentation of him, ſtill, in one among thoſe letters, which he calls "The Picture," containing a deſcription and character of himſelf; which we ſhould

Ariſtotle, and modeſt as Mr. Collier could wiſh, yet 'it promotes more lewdneſs in the conſequence, and 'procures more effectually for intrigue, than any Rover, Libertine, or Old Bachelor, whatſoever. At 'laſt comes the Epilogue, which pleaſes the audience 'very well, becauſe it ſends them away, and terminates the fate of the Poet; the Patentees rail at him, 'the town damns him, and he may bury his copy in 'Paul's, for not a bookſeller about it will put it in 'print.' Hence he farther proceeds to obſerve, how the town has been often diſappointed in theſe critical plays, and how authors who have been admired in their ſpeculative remarks, have been ridiculed in the practice: ſo adviſes his friend to lay aſide his ſuperſtitious veneration for antiquity, and the uſual objections that the preſent age is illiterate, or their taſte vitiated; that we live in the decay of time, and the dotage of the world; which he contradicts, and aſks him, why we ſhould be ſo hampered in our opinions, as if all the ruins of antiquity lay ſo heavily on the bones of us, that we could not ſtir hand or foot?

'Why ſhould the Poets be hoodwinked at this rate, 'and by what authority ſhould Ariſtotle's rules of 'poetry ſtand ſo fixed and immutable? Why?—By 'the authority of two thouſand years ſtanding—becauſe, through this long revolution of time, the world 'has ſtill continued the ſame—by the authority of 'their being received at Athens, a city, the very 'ſame with London in every particular; their habits 'the ſame, their humours alike; their public tranſactions and private ſocieties à la mode de France;—'in ſhort, ſo very much the ſame in every circumſtance, that Ariſtotle's criticiſms may give rules to 'Drury-Lane; the Areopagus give judgment upon a 'caſe in the King's Bench; and old Solon ſhall give 'laws to the Houſe of Commons!'

Then he proceeds by farther illuſtrations to ſhew, that we are not to form theſe modern and domeſtic entertainments, if we hope for ſucceſs, upon antient or foreign plans; with ſpecifying how eaſy it were, out of Dr. Tillotſon's Sermons, to trump up a pamphlet upon the art of preaching, whence concluſions ſhall be drawn as from Ariſtotle in Poetry, that any ſermon whatſoever, either by a Preſbyter in Geneva, or a Jeſuit in Spain, that deviates from theſe rules, deſerves to be hiſſed, and the Prieſt kicked out of the pulpit.

Then he gives another inſtance—'I go down to 'Woolwich, and there upon a piece of paper I take 'the dimenſions of the Royal Sovereign, and from 'hence I frame a Model of a Man of War: I divide 'the ſhip into three principal parts, the Keel, the 'Hull, and the Rigging: I ſubdivide theſe into their 'proper denominations, and, by the help of a ſailor, 'give you all the terms belonging to every rope, and 'every office in the whole ſhip: will you from hence, 'infer that I am an excellent ſhipwright, and that 'this model is proper for a trading junk upon the 'Volga, or a Venetian galley in the Adriatic Sea?'

It is farther from his arguments to be gathered, that, if Homer had ſubmitted to the rules of criticiſm, he had been more regular, but more enervate; more formally circumſcribed, but leſs copious and ſublime; more crude, contracted, barren, and debaſed, than he any where is; in a word, had finiſhed every thing off with the niceſt and moſt artful declenſion of grandeur and magnificence; whence and from other parts, it is inferred, that a Homer cannot want the leading-ſtrings of an Ariſtotle, and that poets derived not their art from books of criticiſm, but critics theirs from thoſe of poetry. And he thinks, that, 'If Prince Arthur 'had been in the place of the Iliad we ſhould have 'had other rules for Epic Poetry; and Doctor Blackmore, had carried the bays from Homer, in ſpight of 'all the critics in Chriſtendom.' In like manner, as the "Paradiſe Loſt" is not wholly confined to the dictates of that Philoſopher, other laws of Epic Poetry may be drawn out of Milton hereafter by another Ariſtotle. Then, as for his rules of Dramatic Poetry, 'If they had been drawn from certain and immutable 'principles, and fixed on the baſis of nature, (more 'convincing than in thoſe generalities wherein it is 'the ſame in all nations) why ſhould not his Ars 'Poetica be as efficacious now as it was two thouſand years ago? And a ſingle Plot, with perfect 'Utility of Time and Place, do as well as Lincoln's 'Inn Fields, as at the play-houſe in Athens?'

He farther looked upon Homer as a man of too great a knowledge in the immaterialities of his art, to preſcribe it materially and pedantically by grammar-rules, or in mood and figure, to the varieties of genius among mankind. 'He was too much a poet to 'give rules to that, whoſe excellence he knew con'ſiſted in a free and unlimited flight of imagination; 'and to deſcribe the Spirit of Poetry, which alone is 'the Art of Poetry, he knew to be as impoſſible as 'for human reaſon to teach the Gift of Prophecy by 'a definition.'

He is for making Æſop the father of comedy, and thinks, 'we cannot now better ſeek for its foundation than in his ſymbolical way of moralizing upon 'tales and fables, with this difference, that his ſtories 'were ſhorter than ours. He had his tyrant Lyon, 'his ſtateſman Fox, his beau Magpie, his coward 'Hare, his bravo Aſs, and his buffoon Ape, with all 'the characters that crowd our ſtages every day; with 'this diſtinction, nevertheleſs, that Æſop made his 'beaſts ſpeak good Greek, and our heroes ſometimes 'cannot talk good Engliſh.' He goes on to ſhew, how, by ſuch antient and modern practice, in Scripture Parables and Alluſions, with other indirect, inſinuating, and moſt palatable, as well as expedient, arts of ſchooling mankind into better manners, what was the primary End of Comedy, and would afford the juſteſt Rules for it. Thus, having diſplayed the principal threads of his diſcourſe, he winds himſelf up in his concluſions:

'That our buſineſs lies not with a French or Spa'niſh audience; that our deſign is not to hold forth to 'antient Greece, not to moralize upon the vices and 'defaults of the Roman commonwealth: No, no: 'An Engliſh play is intended for the uſe and inſtruction 'of an Engliſh audience; a people, not only ſeparated 'from the reſt of the world by ſituation, but different 'alſo from other nations, as well in the complexion 'and temperament of the natural body as in the conſtitution of our body politic: as we are a mixture of 'many nations, ſo we have the moſt unaccountable 'medley of humours among us, of any people upon 'earth: theſe humours produce variety of follies, 'ſome of them unknown to former ages; theſe new 'diſtempers muſt have new remedies, which are nothing but new counſels and inſtructions; ſo begs, if 'our utile, which is the end, be different from the 'antients, that our dulce, which is the means, be ſo 'too; for, to different towns there muſt be different 'ways, &c.

'Then, what ſort of dulce, which he takes for the 'pleaſantry of the tale, or the plot of the play, muſt 'a man make uſe of to engage the attention of ſo 'many different humours and inclinations? Will a 'ſingle plot ſatisfy every body? Will the turns and 'ſurpriſes that may reſult naturally from the antient 'limits of time, be ſufficient to rip open the ſpleen 'of ſome, and phyſic the melancholy of others; 'ſcrew up the attention of a rover, and fix him to 'the ſtage, in ſpight of his volatile temper, and the 'temptation of a maſk? To make the moral inſtructive you muſt make the ſtory diverting: the ſplenetic Wit, the beau Courtier, the heavy Citizen, the 'fine Lady, and her fine Footman, come all to be inſtructed, and therefore muſt be all diverted; and he 'that can do this beſt, and with moſt applauſe, writes 'the beſt Comedy, let him do it by what rules he 'pleaſes, ſo they be not offenſive to religion and 'good manners.' Thus his grand and general rule for our ſtage is, to be as generally inſtructive as he can, which cannot be without making his works delightful to the generality. This ſecret of pleaſing ſo generally ſuch different taſtes in a modern audience muſt be attained by ſtudying the humours of the moderns: ſo he prefers the models of Shakeſpeare, Fletcher, and others of our own poets, who made themſhould not refrain from tranſcribing entirely, as what might contribute ſo properly and directly to the illuſtration of his life, if his works were a ſcarcity; but, as they are not, we ſhall only here ſketch out a few of the ſtrongeſt or moſt diſtinguiſhing and obſervable lineaments; that he may not be wholly unknown to thoſe who have not ſeen them, nor wholly forgotten by thoſe who have[F]. In 1703, came forth another diverting comedy of his, intituled, "The Inconſtant, or the Way to win Him," which had merit enough to have been equally ſucceſsful with the reſt, but for the inundation of Italian, French, and other farcical, interruptions; which, through the intereſt of ſome and the depravity of others, broke in upon the ſtage, to the ſcandal, in being ſubmitted to, of our more refined taſte, which had preferred its own genuine, weighty ſterling, our true Engliſh humour, wit, and ſenſe, to ſuch coin as was baſe, light, and counterfeit. Theſe foreigners made partizans among our treacherous countrymen to depreciate our dramatic and other poetical writers, eſpecially ſeveral whoſe compoſitions had been well received, and conſequently our author, whom we meet with, in a ſatire of that kind, publiſhed the next year, thus ſpoken of[G]. It ſeems to have been ſo early as 1704, that the farce called themſelves no ſlaves to the patterns or precepts of antiquity, before thoſe of Plautus and Menander. Not that he rejects or deſpiſes all rules or decorum: he is not for having the Engliſh Stage a State of Anarchy: "No, Sir,—For, there are extremes in irregularity, "as dangerous to an author as too ſcrupulous a de"ference to criticiſm." And hereof, as he had given an inſtance of the one, ſo he alſo gives an example of the other. Concluding, that he is as little a friend to theſe rambling plays as any body; and that he has never eſpouſed their party by his own practice; yet cannot forbear ſome farther vindication of the great Shakeſpeare upon this head (*); and then, thus begs the critical carpers to let our old Engliſh authors alone.

(*) With a view to the rigid cenſures of Mr. Rymer.

'If they have left vice unpuniſhed, virtue unrewarded, folly unexpoſed, or prudence unſucceſsful, the contrary of which is the utile of the comedy, let them be laſhed to ſome purpoſe: if any part of their plots have been independent of the reſt, or any of their characters forced or unnatural, which deſtroys the dulce of plays, let them be hiſſed off the ſtage: but if, by a true decorum in theſe material points, they have writ ſucceſsfully, and anſwered the end of Dramatic Poetry, in every reſpect, let them reſt in peace, and their memories enjoy the encomiums due to their merit, without any reflection for waving thoſe niceties, which are neither inſtructive to the world nor diverting to mankind; but are, like all the reſt of the critical learning, fit only to ſet people together by the ears, in ridiculous controverſies, that are not one jot material to the good of the public, whether they be true or falſe.'

[F] That he may not be wholly unknown to thoſe who have not ſeen them, nor wholly forgotten by thoſe who have.] Our author tells the lady to whom this reſemblance of himſelf was ſent, (when he was aged about twenty-three years,) that he would challenge Vandyck or Kneller to draw it more to the life; and, if he had not ſome thoughts that the ſubſtance would fall to her ſhare, he would not part with the likeneſs; which he thus colours forth, in ſome of the principal features, under the title of

'My Outſide is neither better nor worſe than my Creator made it; and, the Piece being drawn by ſo great an Artiſt, it were preſumption to ſay there were many Strokes amiſs. I have a body qualified to anſwer all the ends of its creation, and that's ſufficient.

'As to the Mind, which in moſt men wears as many changes as their body, ſo, in me, it is generally dreſſed, like my perſon, in black.——In ſhort, my conſtitution is very ſplenetic, and very amorous; both which I endeavour to hide, leſt the former ſhould offend others, and that the latter might incommode myſelf: and my reaſon is ſo vigilant in reſtraining theſe two failings, that I am taken for an eaſy-natured man by my own ſex, and an ill-natured clown by your's.

'It is true, I am very ſparing in my praiſes and compliments to a Lady, out of a fear that they may affect myſelf more than her: for, the idols, which we worſhip, are generally of our own making; and though at firſt men may not ſpeak what they think, yet truth may catch them on the other hand, and make them think what they ſpeak.

'But, moſt of all, I am cautious of promiſing, eſpecially upon that weighty article of conſtancy; becauſe, in the firſt place, I have never tried the ſtrength of it in my own experience; and, ſecondly, I ſuppoſe a man can no more engage for his conſtancy, than his health; ſince I believe they both equally depend upon a certain conſtitution of body: how far, and how frequently that may be liable to alteration, eſpecially in affairs of love, let the more judicious determine.

'I am ſeldom troubled with what the world calls airs and caprices; and I think it an idiot's excuſe for a fooliſh action, to ſay, 'twas my humour.—I can't reliſh the jeſt that vexes another in earneſt.—I think it the worſt office in my nature to make myſelf uneaſy for what another ſhould be puniſhed.—I have ſo naturally a propenſity to eaſe, that I cannot cheerfully fix to any ſtudy that bears not a pleaſure in the application, which makes me inclinable to Poetry above any thing elſe.

'I have very little eſtate, but what lies under the circumference of my hat; and ſhould I, by misfortune, come to loſe my head, I ſhould not be worth a groat: but I ought to thank Providence, that I can, by three hours ſtudy, live one and twenty, with ſatisfaction to myſelf, and contribute to the maintenance of more families than ſome who have thouſands a year.

'I have many acquaintance, very few intimates, but no friends, I mean in the old romantic way.—Nor can I love after the old romantic diſcipline: I would have my paſſion, if not led, yet, at leaſt, waited on, by my reaſon; and the greateſt proof of my affection, that a lady muſt expect, is this: I would run any hazard to make us both happy, but would not, for any tranſitory pleaſure, make either of us miſerable, &c.'

[G] Whom we meet with, in a ſatire of that kind, publiſhed the next year, thus ſpoken of.] In this ſatire, among ſome other poets, whoſe endeavours to pleaſe the town had made them objects of the author's conſideration, the omiſſion of Mr. Farquhar's would have made him appear too inconſiderable; but, as they had met with a reception more ſingularly ſucceſsful, it may expoſe a ſingular deficiency as well in the author's genius as juſtice, to ſummon our Poet into the Court of Apollo upon ſuch inſolid and ungrounded matter of accuſation, how natural ſoever and unavoidable it may be, for a general eſteem, to be ſure of propagating ſome particular envy.

Therefore, after the ſaid ſatiriſt has ſet Mr. Francis Manning's claim to the bays aſide, for the defects of his called "The Stage Coach," in the compoſition whereof he was jointly concerned, made its firſt appearance in print: and it has always given ſatisfaction, both in England and Ireland; unleſs to ſome ungrateful fault-finders, and thoſe who will ſeek matter to diſpleaſe themſelves in ſuch things as might yield them pleaſure. At this time Mr. Farquhar had been about a twelve-month married, and, it was at firſt reported, to a great fortune; which might not a little exaſperate the invidious temper of thoſe who grudged his proſperity. His next comedy, named "The Twin Rivals," which he dates, at the bottom of the dedication, in December, two years before that farce, might therefore be acted, and publiſhed, a year before it, as ſome have intimated it was; but, in ſeveral other accounts, it is ſpoken of as if it was neither played nor printed before 1705 (d). Our poet was poſſeſſed of his commiſſion in the army, when the Spaniſh expedition was made under the conduct of the Earl of Peterborough, though it ſeems he kept it not long after; and, though Mr. Farquhar was not embarked in that ſervice, or preſent at the defeat of the French forces, and the conqueſt of Barcelona, yet, from ſome military friends in that engagement, he received ſuch diſtinct and complete relations of it, in their epiſtolary correſpondence, and more particular information upon the return of ſome others, that he wrote a copious poem upon the ſubject, wherein he has made the ſaid Earl his hero. But, it not being publiſhed till after our poet's death, it is ſomewhat wanting in thoſe corrections wherewith it would have been improved and ornamented had his health allowed him a deliberate review (e). Some two or three years after it was written (*), the impreſſion of it was addreſſed, by the author's widow, to the ſaid Nobleman: and, becauſe it was never reprinted with his other works, and is therefore now ſcarce, the epiſtle before it not being prolix, is here below preſerved [H]. This poem is enough to prove that Mr. Farquhar did not burn all his unprinted writings before his death, as the author of his Memoirs has intimated he did. There are two more of his plays to be ſpoken of, which have no leſs attracted the town, and been received with no leſs approbation, than any before mentioned; the one, his comedy called "The Recruiting Officer;" which, as we compute, was firſt acted in 1706; though, in the printed regiſters of our dramatic writings, the firſt edition of it is dated in the following year: and the firſt impreſſion of his laſt comedy, intituled "The Beaux Stratagem," is mentioned in thoſe regiſters to have been no earlier than three years after our author was dead: whence they have alſo, very his own writings, but allowed him to adopt thoſe of the Honourable Mr. Charles Boyle, afterwards Earl of Orrery, he goes on thus:

Is it ſo, then? ſaid Farquhar; my matters are ſafe;
By Saint Patrick, my buſineſs is done;
For 'tis known, I have made Pit and Gallery laugh,
Without any one's help but my own.

My Jubilee Dicky, and airy Sir Harry,
Will vindicate what I have ſaid;
And none, but myſelf, has a title to carry
The laurels away on my head.

By your leave, brother Teague, reply'd Mac Freckno's ghoſt (†),
Our countrymen are better known;
The Beauties are borrow'd, of which you thus boaſt,
But the Faults, I dare ſwear, are your own.

Though the town may allow, what you'd have 'em all take
For granted, with no one you join;
Since none, but a man of your judgment, could make Such language to ſuch a deſign.

To the Right Honourable CHARLES Earl of PETERBOROUGH and MONMOUTH.

'My LORD,

'MY preſumption, in dedicating to your Lord-'ſhip this poem, found among my dear de-'ceaſed huſband's writings, will I hope obtain, not 'only your Lordſhip's pardon, but favourable accep-'tance. For, to whom ſhould this addreſs be made, 'but to that hero, who is the glorious ſubject of the 'ſong. Happy! could it by art repreſent what was 'really done by your Lordſhip in that expedition, ſo 'ſurpriſing, as not only ſurpaſſes all poetic deſcrip-'tion, but makes even truth itſelf romantic. The 'difficulties your Lordſhip had to encounter, in the 'different intereſts and opinions of your confederates, 'was not the leaſt part of that undertaking. You 'were to convince, before you engaged; and your 'invincible reaſon was to confirm the aſſured con-'queſt of your ſword. Monjuich, beyond obeliſks 'and pyramids, will be the eternal monument of your 'fame; where, upon the fall of that great though 'unhappy Prince of Darmſtad, your Lordſhip heroi-'cally interpoſed, turned, and aſſured the fate of the 'Auſtrian monarchy. Barcelona, became the rival 'of Madrid, and Madrid itſelf had received its natu-'ral Lord; and, had not envy itſelf blaſted the ſure-'laid deſign, my Lord Mordaunt had rivalled the 'glory of the Black Prince himſelf, on the theatre of 'Spain.

'Accept, great Sir, theſe laurels, planted by your 'tranſcendent valour, and reaped by your victorious 'arm. Accept that tribute, which is here offered, 'by an humble but ſincere hand, to that magnificent 'virtue, which hath reſtored the foundation of the 'Auſtrian Spaniſh monarchy, and which none but 'our great Queen can eſtabliſh and confirm.

'That your Lordſhip may live, to ſee the effects 'of ſo glorious an undertaking ratified, in a ſure and 'laſting peace; the Weſt-India trade flowing into the 'Britiſh channel; and the good wiſhes of all good 'men, derived into laſting bleſſings upon your Lord-'ſhip and noble family, is the hearty prayer of, my 'Lord,

'Your Lordſhip's moſt devoted,

'humble ſervant,

'MARGARET FARQUHAR (16).

[I] Of theſe Plays we ſhall refer to ſome few further remarks, here proper to be remembered.] It has been with ſome difficulty, and not without ſome doubt, that we have ſettled the firſt appearance and publication of theſe plays, through the uſual blindneſs in all latter editions, and blunders of our poetical regiſters in thoſe particulars, as we have in this artitcle above done; to ſupply the text with thoſe neceſſary links of chronology, which, as the writings of a poet are generally the main actions of his life, would have been wanting in that principal chain, or capital part thereof, had we reſerved the ſaid dates to be ſhrunk into this, or any other limb of it. The general character, that has been given of theſe Comedies, is that, 'the 'ſucceſs of moſt of them far exceeded the author's ex-'pectations; that he was particularly happy in the 'choice of his ſubjects, which he took care to adorn 'with variety of characters and incidents; his ſtyle 'is pure and unaffected; his wit, natural and flow-'ing; and his plots generally well contrived. He 'laſhed the vices of the age, though with a merciful 'hand; for, his Muſe was good-natured, not abounding 'over-much with gall, though he has been blamed for 'it by the critics. It has been objected to him, that 'he was too haſty in his productions; but, I believe, 'by ſuch only, who are chiefly admirers of ſtiff and 'elaborate performances; ſince, with a perſon of a 'ſprightly fancy, thoſe things are often beſt, which 'are ſtruck off in a heat (17).' It has been alſo obſerved that his humour, being truly natural, makes all his plays very entertaining, and that, his principal characters, in ſeveral of them, were generally copies of himſelf (18); which are gay, briſk, and vigorous; courtly, amorous and gallant, or intriguing parts: particularly it is ſaid, that, in his character of George Roebuck, a wild young rover, in his firſt play (19), newly come from Ireland, becauſe he would not, in obedience to his father, marry a woman, by whom he had twins at a birth there, who therefore follows him here to London, &c. it was thought, that the author has therein, or at leaſt in other incidents, ſketched out, in ſome part or ſome meaſure, his own ſtory. This is partly hinted at by a writer of that time, who, ſpeaking of Mr. Thomas Browne, ſays of him, and ſome other contemporary poets, that, 'had he been as happy in his temper as in his genius, he had certainly 'been hoiſted up among the firſt-rate wits of his time: 'his lewdneſs had been no blot on his ſcutcheon there: 'it was not Tate's ſeeming ſanctity that preferred him 'to the bays; nor Congreve's chaſtity to the opi-'nion of the quality: Shadwell had never been Lau-'reat in his latter days but by being an early rake, 'and fixing his reputation with Dorſet, Sidley, and 'the reſt: it was not Vanbrugh's modeſt plays that 'raiſed his eſteem among the ladies, nor Motteux's 'pretence of being a perſecuted brother, that exalted 'him, from a ſolitary garret, to the reputation of a 'current credit upon the exchange, and a place in 'the Poſt-office: Rowe had ſhewn more wit in keep-'ing his eſtate than he has ſhewn in all the plays he 'ever writ, eſpecialy the laſt: and certainly Mr. 'Farquhar knew how neceſſary lewdneſs was to eſta-'bliſh his reputation, when he expoſed Roebuck, in 'the firſt play he writ, for his own character (20).' And yet his writings are not ſo diſagreeable in this reſpect, or corruptingly looſe, as ſeveral of ſome other poets here mentioned: his genteel gallants and flighty rakes have ſuch an airy volatile manner of carrying off any liberties in their ludicrous or jocular diſcourſe, that they are not ſo deeply affecting, nor leave ſuch pernicious impreſſions upon the imagination, as other figures of the like kind, more ſtrongly ſtampt by more indelicate and heavier hands, have an untoward faculty of doing. In this our author's firſt play, Poet Lyric makes free with burleſquing ſome of Nat Lee's Heroics, in his Sophoniſba, &c. It is dedicated to Peregrine Marquis of Carmarthen, and the prologue and epilogue were written by Joe Hains, a noted player and prologue-writer, of merry memory in thoſe times, who played Pamphlet the bookſeller, and Rigadoon the dancing-maſter, in this comedy; and various other parts, not only on the ſmaller but the larger ſtage of the world itſelf, in many other countries as well as England; diverting both Princes and people, wherever he went, Proteus and Camelion like, in all ſhapes and colours: whether, as Mr. Joſeph Hains, Seignor Giuſippe Hains, or Monſieur Hains; whether, as Secretary Hains, Preceptor Hains, Doctor Hains, Count Hains; or any other dignity whereto he was advanced, or title he aſſumed (21).

Mr. Farquhar's next comedy (22) is dedicated to Sir Roger Moſtyn, of Moſtyn-Hall, in Flintſhire. The author's friend, who wrote the Prologue, ſays the ladies may ſafely ſmile; for, there is neither ſcandal, ſmut, lewd-tongued beau, or double entendre, in it; to which ſenſe, our author aſſerts in his preface, that 'he has not diſpleaſed the ladies, nor offended the 'clergy; both which were now pleaſed to ſay, that 'a comedy may be diverting without ſmut or pro-'faneneſs.' The epilogue was ſpoken by Mr. Wilks, who acted ſo excellently the chief part, that our author, in that preface, ſays of him; 'Mr. Wilks's 'performance has ſet him ſo far above competition, 'in the part of Wildair, that none can pretend to envy 'the praiſe due to his merit: that he made the part, will 'appear,' ſays he, 'from hence, that, whenever the 'ſtage has the misfortune to loſe him, Sir Harry Wild-'air may go to the Jubilee.' But the Poet may be happily miſtaken in his prophecy, the ſource of theatrical merit may change its channel, and the part, in time, may make the player, if it has not as yet altogether done ſo, equal to the original actor of it; ſeeing it has been always well received as often as it has been played, ſince death, for many years paſt, has denied us his maſterly performance in it. And it were to be wiſhed, that this generous applauſe of that ſprightly and graceful actor's abilities, may not have tended to affect the character of our author's own; ſince it may ſeem, that, ſuch grateful encomiums upon the perfections of the comedian, have promoted ſome ingratitude towards thoſe of the comedy; for, it is believed, that ſuch praiſes, by our author of his actors, have hinted, to ſome rivals for preheminence in the Muſes favour on the drama, who were jealous of any growing monopolies in that ſphere, ſome attempts to make a plauſible transfer of his praiſe, by attributing that, which was due to the ſucceſs of Mr. Farquhar's comedies, more to the merits of the players than the poet; more to the enlivening gaiety and gallantry of thoſe, by whom his characters were perſonated, than the intermixtures of that wit and humour, which uſually prepoſſeſs us in favour of ſuch characters in other plays (23); which illiberal artifice of poets and other ingenious men, towards one another, is no novelty; for juſt ſo, not to mention other inſtances, Mr. Shadwell before had endeavoured the like alienation, by imputing the deſerved eſteem and laudable reception of Mr. Otway's moſt approved plays, not to any thing in the acts, but the actors of them (24). A later critick, who has alſo been a candidate for theatrical approbation, having in a uſeful work, which deſerves it, among others, drawn out the plot of this play, and called it a celebrated comedy, full of contrivance; yet thinks, the plot not regular, or conſiſting of certain means, to compaſs a certain end; becauſe the cataſtrophe appears as it were involuntary, and owing to the chance of incidents more than to meaſures concerted with deſign (25); which, whether defective or commendable, we have not now leiſure to examine, ſince, in ſome caſes, the greateſt art is artfully to conceal a deſign under the appearance of chance. But here we are reminded of a little dialogue, which happened upon the great ſucceſs of this play, between Jubilee Dicky, a noted part in it, and Thomas Durfey, the poet, or poetaſter, which you pleaſe; as we received it, from a late living magazine of merry tales, jeſts, and other conceits of the noted wits and authors of his time. It ſeems Durfey wanted to bring a play thor's untimely end, which was so much regretted, in a person who had been so generally delightful, both in his writings and conversation, we can give but a melancholy, a play upon the Theatre Royal, and meeting little Dicky in the height of spirits, at the great resort to Farquhar's comedy, asked him, 'When they should 'have some breathing-time to get up a play of his?' 'What is it?' said Dicky. 'Why don't you know 'the story of Massianello, the Prince of Fishermen?' 'Ay, ay, but I fear his fish will grow stale upon his 'hands, or make but insipid entertainment at our 'house during this Carnival there. 'Why, will the 'humour in your Constant Couple last for ever?' No, 'no, the Trip that is making in it to this Jubilee 'will surely be at an end by the Revolution of the 'next.' But it scarcely was; for we are told, in one place, that it had run for fifty-two nights (26), and may learn from our author himself, that it so much filled the stage, for the greater part of that season, that it brought the play-house some fifty audiences in five months (27): and, immediately after, he was encouraged to bring on a continuation of it in another comedy for the next season. In short, the fancy of the town was so engrossed even by the former of these comedies, that Durfey soon carried his play to Mr. Betterton's company in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and the tripping humour, in both of them, endured so long, that little Jubilee Dicky, in all common discourse, either with or of him, lost his Christian name ever after; and hundreds called him Dicky, as long as he lived, to one who called him Henry Norris.

(27) Preface to Mr. Farquhar's Inconstant: or the Way to Win Him.

This second part (28) is dedicated by the author to the Earl of Albemarle. His prologue to it is founded upon the same sentiments he soon after published, more at large, in his Discourse on Comedy, as we have before shewn; and we see here in verse, as there in prose, that his general deduction is to make his dramatic entertainments generally delightful, that they may be alike instructive, which could not be done without making them engaging to the generality, by taking greater licence than the antients have confined us to, and drawing the several new shapes and habits in modern life, for an English stage, not from the patterns of old Greece or Rome, but rather to make the living audience his rule than the dead letter of Aristotle. He found, by successful experience, the best comic sport to consist in springing and flushing the fresh wild game that lay before or about him, and taking his aim there, at the fashionable gallantries, and modish extravagances in real life; the new-fledged humours and manners, the full-plumed vanities and affectations of the times; the ridiculous follies, seducing fallacies, the novel disguises and deceits of the town: this was the fat-fed game he was for catching as it rose, or shooting on the wing; as Mr. Pope professedly prescribed and enjoined himself to pursue afterwards (29): which was only to be done by more enlarged schemes in respect to the drama than were antiently limited, or are now descended to us. As for any formal and regular revival of the trite and thread-bare figures or characters of antiquity, he leaves them in possession of the antients, and to the rumination of the grave and critical antiquaries; as he says, in that prologue himself:

(28) Sir Harry Wildair: being The Sequel of The Trip to the Jubilee.

(29) In his Essay on Man.

He leaves to learned pens such labour'd lays,
You are the Rules by which he writes his plays:
From musty books let others take their view;
He hates dull reading, but he studies you.
Thus then the Pit and Boxes are his Schools,
Your Air, your Humour, his dramatic rules, &c.

The fourth of these plays (30) he dedicates to his countryman and fellow collegiate, Richard Tighe, Esq. from whom he partly copied the character of young Mirabell, so well acted by Mr. Wilks. It drew a splendid and crowded audience for six nights successively, till Lent intervened, though the tumblers, rope-dancers, French dancing-masters, dancing dogs, French strollers, and Italian squallers, had now so much engrossed the town, that our author has, with no less good sense than good humour, very genteely rallied our depraved taste and extravagance at that time therein; as well he might, when that beardless songster, Sigismondo Fideli, had twenty pounds a night for singing (31): Also in dancing, as Mr. Farquhar observes, the charms of Gallic heels were too hard for an English head, and that no instruction in the moral of a play could come in competition with that of a minuet. He owns that he took the hint of this comedy from "Fletcher's Wild-Goose Chase;" and that admired turn of the plot in the last act, which has drawn tears of joy from many bright eyes, was built upon a real adventure of the Chevalier de Chastillon, well known at Paris. There is an ingenious epilogue to this play, composed by Nicholas Rowe, Esq. and in the humorous prologue, written by Mr. Motteaux, the farce, above named, which was written by him in conjunction with our author, being mentioned, seems to have been composed the same year by them, if not before, though it might not be printed till the next.

(30) The Inconstant: or The Way to Win Him, 1703.

(31) Hist. of the English Stage, as before, p. 135.

And that same year also, soon after the comedy last mentioned, his fifth seems to have been brought on the stage (32). It is dedicated to Henry Brett, Esq. in December 1702, therefore printed the next year, as we presume, from the date of that satire next quoted in the margin; though some writers know not of its appearance till two years later. Our poet having, in the preface, ingeniously obviated such objections as had been made to it, owns himself obliged to Mr. Longueville (*) for some expressions in the part of Teague; something in that of the lawyer, and for his hint of the Twins, upon which the author formed his plot. After this acknowledgment, he adds, that few of our modern writers have been less beholden to foreign assistance in their plays than he in the scenes of this. But, how slender soever the assistance was that he had, it was enough to be snarled at by the little cynical satyrists, who, envying the success of his plays, had pronounced the beauties in them to be borrowed, but the blemishes to be his own; as was before related. Another of these satirists says of Mr. Farquhar, with intent, perhaps, of fathering this play wholly upon the said Mr. Longueville, and one of our famous poets, from whom it is there said to be drawn, in these words,

(32) The Twin Rivals, 1703, 1705, &c.

(*) Who was, as we are told, our author's countryman, and a fencing-master, as was also his son James; and that he long laboured to produce a Comedy, but without success.

His fame he built on mighty D'avenant's wit,
And lately own'd a play, that he ne'er writ (33):

So names this, called the Twin-Rivals, in the margin. The reason why we have fixt the publication of the farce before-mentioned in the next year after the last play is grounded on the authority of that author, who quotes two impressions of it in that year (34), though several others mention it, as if it was not published before our author had been three years in his grave.

Between the publication of this and his next dramatic performance, our poet had been in Shrewsbury, and other parts of Shropshire to recruit soldiers for his regiment or company. There he gathered matter for the plot and characters of his diverting comedy upon that subject (35); and this, as we compute, was acted in 1706, though it is not mentioned to have been printed before the next year. He dedicates it, for the hospitable reception he had there received, to his friends 'round the Wrekin, a noted hill in that county, which this play has made more so, by promoting a health in drinking to our friends so situated; 'a health 'that has the advantage over other celebrated toasts, 'of being a lasting beauty; old without age, and com-'mon without scandal:' and in this dedication excuses Mr. Rich for acting his play upon Durfey's third night, for his "Wonders of the Sun, or Kingdom of "Birds," though it is not said, in our erroneous registers of plays, to have been acted till three or four years after this time; and then, that it was at the Theatre in the Hay-Market. Our author tells us, 'that the Duke of Ormond encouraged him, and the 'Earl of Orrery approved the play: my recruits were 'reviewed by my General and my Colonel, and 'could choly, if not tragical, account. For, ſome debts, it ſeems, preſſing him to make his application to a certain noble courtier, who had beſtowed upon him moſt bountiful profeſſions of ſolid friendſhip, he was, by that plauſible patron, perſuaded to turn his commiſſion into the money he wanted, and this man of honour, by his intereſt, would get him another; but, when the profitable friend in his purſe was gone, he could not find the honourable one, truly, in court, nor in the courtier himſelf! which diſappointment, in this dependance of his courtly friend, with the other he had undergone in the fortune of that lady whom he had eſpouſed for her love of him, now uniting to prey more eagerly on his mind, and tormenting it with the corroding reflections of ſome domeſtic difficulties in the neceſſary accommodation of his family, made way to his heart, and, by a ſure, though no ſudden declenſion of nature, carried him off this worldly theatre, while his laſt play was acting, in the height of its ſucceſs, at that in Drury-Lane: and, though the audience all beſtowed their plaudits upon the performance, ſome could not conceal their tears for the approaching loſs of its author; which happened, in the latter end of April, in the year 1707, before he was thirty years of

'could not fail to paſs muſter; and ſtill to add to my 'ſucceſs, they were raiſed among my friends round 'the Wrekin (*).' Mr. Wilks played Captain Plume, and Mr. Cibber, Captain Brazen, the two Recruiting Officers; Richard Eſtcourt, a celebrated comedian and mimic, played Serjeant Kite; and Sylvia the juſtice's daughter was performed by Mrs. Oldfield, whoſe name appears not in the dramatis perſonæ before any other comedy of our author's earlier than this. Here again, as in the "Trip to the Jubilee," we have been led to believe, that what ſupports the ſucceſs of the play in one of thoſe parts is, the proper ſenſe and obſervation of the player; that the humour is not conceived to be hit in Serjeant Kite, but is admirably ſupplyed by the action of Mr. Eſtcourt (36). But a later writer who ſeems to have more particularly examined this play, and given us diſtinctly the plan, characters and incidents of it, has been more regardful of its merits; and, from its connected parts, concludes with this general character of the whole, where it is ſaid,—'there are, beſides the two grand deſigns, 'ſome leſſer ones, tending to gain recruits; yet, at 'the ſame time, are alſo conducive ſome way or other 'to the better carrying on the main buſineſs; ſuch as 'Serjeant Kite's pretending to tell fortunes;—Sylvia, 'in the habit of a man, making love to Roſe, a pretty 'country girl;—Captain Plume, cajoling Bullock, 'Coſtar Pearmain, and Thomas Appletree, with 'ſeveral other little incidents, which are extremely 'diverting in the repreſentation, and altogether ſerve 'to render this comedy as entertaining as any I know 'of, that the ſtage for many years has had to boaſt 'of; and I believe will always continue to be ſo; at 'leaſt while there are any military gentlemen in the 'kingdom; ladies who delight in a red coat and 'feather; or, in fine, while there remain any lovers 'of true nature in a dramatic performance (37).' This comedy has lately been tranſlated into French, under the title of "L'Officier en Recruë," and it was acted (*), to a full audience, at the little theatre in the Hay-market, by the Engliſh company of Antigallic players, with great applauſe: whence it may be concluded, this comedy, as would probably be found in others of this author, were they put to the ſame trial, has in it ſuch intrinſic merits, that its ſucceſs neither depends on any particular actors, nor will relinquiſh it even in a foreign language.

The ſeventh and laſt of our author's comedies (38) was certainly written in or towards the end of the ſame year with that laſt mentioned; however an edition of it, which might be printed four years later (*), may have miſled ſome writers of him to think it was then firſt acted; and the author's advertiſement at the beginning, expreſſing his illneſs, as the epilogue at the end, his being ready to expire while the play was in action, might ſtrengthen their opinion to an aſſertion that the comedy was not played, and the poet did not die, before the year in which that edition was dated. But, by looking only into the ſecond page of the comedy, we may ſee reaſon to judge, from what Boniface the innkeeper ſays to Aimwell, of his ale, when he bade the tapſter broach him ſome of his Anno Domini, marked 1706, after having pretended to be ſtored with ſome that was ſmooth as oil, &c. and juſt fourteen years old, on the fifth of next March, it is very apparent that the play was finiſhed before this day of that month in the ſaid year: and this is explained by the ſame humour which Boniface uſes three leaves farther, where his ſaid gueſt talks with him about eatables. He had all dainties in the houſe, that might be got ready for ſupper; but the gueſt could have nothing that he names, therefore bade the landlord bring what he would, that is, what he had. So we may conclude from this as from other authorities hereafter mentioned, that the play, though rehearſed ſome months before, was acted in April following, and till the author made his exit, before the actors in it. Archer, a good ſociable character, and Mrs. Sullen, who was ſociable to him, were very engagingly played by Mr. Wilks and Mrs. Oldfield (*). It has been looked upon as an extraordinary teſtimony of the author's vigorous genius, that, though he was ſo crampt in time as to have begun and ended this play in ſix weeks, and ſo depreſſed in ſpirits by a ſettled ſickneſs upon him all the time, he has yet gained the reputation of having ſung herein like the ſwan, ſweeteſt when dying; the ſaid comedy having been, as we may read, univerſally allowed to be his maſter-piece (39).

Many other particulars of theſe ſeven comedies, &c. no leſs, or perhaps more, material, muſt now be ſubmitted to the prohibition of time: therefore we ſhall only here obſerve, that the firſt edition we have read of them, printed with his Poems and Letters together, was in 1711 (40), and the firſt that we have ſeen of them was printed for Bernard Lintot, &c. in octavo, 1714, which is adorned with a ſculpture before it of Mr. Farquhar, introduced, or led up, by Ben. Jonſon to Apollo. They have ſo well maintained their credit ever ſince as to arrive at eight (41) or nine editions at leaſt. But we cannot part with them without obſerving one general defect in theſe as well as almoſt all other modern editions of books; that all the dates, which would, were they faithfully preſerved, inform us when the ſeveral pieces in them were firſt ſeparately printed, are deſignedly ſuppreſſed, to give place in the title-page for that ſingle date of the year in which they were all printed laſt together. This crippling uſage has been complained of as a mercenary deceit in the proprietors of ſuch copies; tending to the obſcurity of their authors, the confuſion of thoſe editors, and other writers, who are covetous of doing hiſtorical honour and juſtice to their memory, by a regular revival or diſtinction of their performances; and, conſequently, to the diſſatisfaction of all curious readers; and this only, it ſeems, to make ſuch books more vendible and taking, with ignorant and ſuperficial novices, by the greater air that is thus given them of novelty; leſt ſuch ſhallow purchaſers ſhould diſreliſh them for that which ſhould recommend them, by their having received the approbation or encouragement of more judges than by ſuch ſuppreſſion of all chronological directions, as ſo many furrows in the face even of unwrinkled maturity, their cunning owners would have it thought they had ſtood the teſt of.

age; as may, by the authorities annexed, more convincingly appear [K]. Thus, having attended our entertaining dramatiſt over the contracted ſtage of his ſhort life, yet through the various characters, in ſome degree, which he acted on it, of the Player, the Lover, and the Huſband; the Soldier, the Critic, and the Poet, to his final cataſtrophe; it is here time to cloſe the ſcenes, and drop the curtain.

[K] As may, by the authorities annexed, more convincingly appear.] The particulars, relating to thoſe unhappy diſappointments which are ſaid to have haſtened the end of this ingenious poet, and the time when he died, being drawn from the teſtimonies of ſuch as were acquainted with him, and atteſted by other authentic vouchers, are therefore the more credible, and leſs liable to doubt. We find, he had once the opinion, wherewith men of experience have ſometimes kindly appriſed many raw and credulous dependants upon their counterfeit patrons: and had ſome deſign, as we have heard, of diſplaying thoſe characters in their lively colours; of which more hereafter may poſſibly be ſaid in another place. So long ſince, as in ſome of his early publications, he thus intreats his reader to admit him, with the uſual forms of civility — 'If you be a courtier, you will ſhew your breed-'ing; receive him with a ſincere ſmile; ſwear to do 'him all the ſervice you can; and you will certainly 'keep your word—as you uſed to do (42).' But now, it ſeems, he was more ſtrengthened in his faith of the ſincerity that there might be, without any guile or colluſion, in a courtier's generous profeſſions; till his own fatal experience reſtored him to his former judgment, as we ſhall preſently ſee. Upon this part of our ſubject, one of thoſe writers before-mentioned, who knew him, thus expreſſes himſelf.

'His laſt comedy, the "Stratagem," he began and 'ended in ſix weeks, with a ſettled ſickneſs upon him 'all the time; nay, he even perceived the approaches 'of death ere he had finiſhed the ſecond act, and, 'as he had often foretold, died before the run of his 'play was over. His other plays were dedicated to 'perſons of diſtinction, and he deſigned a dedication 'of his laſt to my Lord Cadogan; but his Lordſhip, 'for reaſons unknown, evaded it, though he made 'him a handſome preſent, with promiſes of his future 'favour; which, probably, would have been fulfilled 'if our author had ſurvived; though he had but little 'reaſon to rely on the promiſes of great men; a cer-'tain great courtier having prevailed on him to ſell 'his commiſſion, with ſolemn aſſurances of providing 'for him better, which he forgot to keep (43).' Here this author tells us, that Mr. Farquhar, in one of his ſongs, ſeems to have pointed at that perſon, in the third ſtanza below recited; and this is all he quotes of that famous ſong; which conſiſts of thirteen ſtanzas: but becauſe the very firſt of them, and the two others, being upon the ſame topic, may partly as well concern or reſemble, and help to diſtinguiſh the ſaid great courtier, as others of like features and complexion, they are here ſelected from the reſt, in the SONG of a TRIFLE.

A Trifling Song you ſhall hear,
Begun with a Trifle, and ended:
All Trifling People draw near
And I ſhall be nobly attended.

The Court is from Trifles ſecure,
Gold Keys are no Trifles, we ſee;
White Rods are no Trifles I'm ſure,
Whatever their Bearers may be.

But, if you will go to the place
Where Trifles abundantly breed,
The Levee will ſhew you his Grace,
Makes Promiſes Trifles indeed.

A Coach, with ſix footmen behind,
I count neither Trifle, nor ſin:
But, ye Gods! how oft do we find
A ſcandalous Trifle within (44).

(44) Sung by Archer, in the third act of the Beaux Stratagem.

Then the ſame author goes on, in relation to Mr. Farquhar's other diſappointments in theſe words— 'Tis ſuppoſed that, thus failing of his expectations, 'together with an unfortunate marriage, ſhortened his 'days. For, his wife, by whom he had two daughters 'only, through the reputation of a great fortune, tricked 'him into matrimony. This was chiefly the fault of 'her love; which was ſo violent for him, that ſhe 'reſolved to leave nothing untried to gain him. 'Though ſome huſbands would have proved mere 'huſbands in ſuch a caſe, Mr. Farquhar was ſo 'charmed with her love and underſtanding, that he 'entirely forgave her; therefore, when I ſay an un-'fortunate marriage conduced, with other circum-'ſtances, to the ſhortening his days, I only mean, 'that his fortune being too ſlender to ſupport a family, 'led him into a great many cares and inconveniences: 'for, I have often heard him ſay, that, "it was more 'pain to him, in imagining that his family might 'want a needful ſupport, than the moſt violent death 'that could be inflicted on him." But, his wife being 'long ſince dead, his good friend Mr. Wilks has been 'highly inſtrumental in ſetting his children above 'want (45).' This piece of friendſhip is thus explained elſewhere. 'Mr. Farquhar left two orphan 'daughters. Mr. Wilks gave each of them a benefit-'play, to put them out apprentice to mantua-makers; 'and his worthy friend and patron, to whom he 'dedicated his miſcellanies, Edmund Chaloner, Eſq. 'procured them a penſion of twenty-pounds a year '(46).'

As to our authority for his laſt play being rehearſed in 1706, and then, or in the beginning of 1707, acted, and that the author died this year, it is to be found in the characters, both of it and himſelf, publiſhed at thoſe times (*), in one whereof the author has ſpoken thus of him, but the next month after that in which we aſſerted him to have died. 'All, that love comedy, 'will be ſorry to hear of the death of Mr. Farquhar, 'whoſe two laſt plays had ſomething in them that was 'truly humourous and diverting. 'Tis true, the critics 'will not allow any part of them to be regular; but 'Mr. Farquhar had a genius for comedy, of which 'one may ſay, that it was rather above rules than below 'them. His conduct, though not artful, was ſur-'prizing: his characters, though not great, were 'juſt: his humour, though low, diverting: his dia-'logue, though looſe and incorrect, gay and agreeable: 'and his wit, though not ſuperabundant, pleaſant: 'in a word, his plays have, in the tout enſemble, as 'the painters phraſe it, a certain air of novelty and 'mirth, which pleaſed the audience every time they 'were repreſented; and ſuch as love to laugh at the 'Theatre will probably miſs him more than they 'now imagine (47).'

 [The article above is so copiously and elaborately written (though with something of that awkwardness of style which usually attends Mr. Oldys's compositions), that it cannot require a very large addition. In the Biographia Dramatica, there is a story related concerning Farquhar's conduct when he was a Student at the University of Dublin, which, if true, and it was attested by one of his intimate acquaintance, sets the folly of his early youth in a highly blamable light. A college exercise was appointed him by his tutor on the miracle of our Saviour's walking upon the water. The next day, when he came into the hall for examination, it was found that he had not brought his exercise written, as his fellow-pupils had done. At this the lecturer being displeased, Farquhar offered to make one extempore; and, after considering some time, he observed, that he thought it no great miracle, since the man that is born to be hanged, &c. The impiety of this reply totally extinguished all the approbation which he expected from its wit; and accordingly, at the next sitting of the Governors of the College, he was expelled in the usual form, tanquam pestilentia hujus societatis. Another circumstance, mentioned on the same authority, is, that Mr. Farquhar was reckoned by all his fellow-students as one of the dullest young men in the University, and even was thought to be extremely heavy and disagreeable as a companion (48).

(48) Biographia Dramatica, Vol. I. p. 152.

We cannot avoid giving our approbation to the censure that is passed, at the close of note I, on the manner in which the works of ingenious men are sometimes printed, and the neglect that is paid to chronological distinctions. There is one fashion lately risen among the booksellers, with which we are by no means satisfied. It is that of saying only "A New "Edition," instead of specifying the particular edition of a publication. Matters of this kind may seem to be of little consequence; but a disregard to them is felt by such of the learned as wish to be very accurate in their statement of literary facts, and their references to authors.

We shall take some notice of the distinct characters of Farquhar's plays, as given by the editors of the Biographia Dramatica. Of the "Love and a Bottle" it is observed, that, though it was written by our poet when under twenty years of age, it contains such variety of incident and character, and such a sprightliness of dialogue, as must convince us, that even then he had a very considerable knowledge of the world, and a very clear judgment of the manners of mankind. On account, however, of the looseness of the character of Roebuck, and some other strokes of licentiousness that run through the piece, it has not been acted for many years past (49). "The Constant "Couple," which is a very genteel, lively, and entertaining, performance, has continued to be performed down to the present time. It met with great success at its first appearance, and is always well received whenever it is represented (50). "Sir Harry Wildair" is a continuation of the "Constant Couple," and hath several of the same characters. Yet, although the success and real merit of the first part so much assured a favourable reception to this as to afford it a run of nine nights to crowded audiences, it is by no means equal in merit to the former, nor is it now ever acted (51). "The Inconstant" is a very lively and entertaining comedy, although there are some incidents in it which scarcely come within the limits of credibility. The author, in his preface, and Rowe, in the epilogue, say that the hint of the play only was taken from Beaumount and Fletcher's "Wild-Goose "Chace." But the fact is, that the main plot and whole scenes were borrowed from that performance. The catastrophe of the last act, where young Mirabel is in danger of his life at a Courtezan's house, and is delivered by the carefulness of his mistress Oriana disguised as a page, owes its origin, it is said, to an affair of the like nature, in which the author had himself some concern, when on military duty abroad (52). "The Stage-Coach," which employed the united abilities of Farquhar and Motteaux, is after all nothing more than a plagiarism; for the plot and some entire scenes are taken from a little French piece, called "Les Carosses d' Orléans (53)." "The Recruiting "Officer" is a most entertaining and lively comedy, "which is at this time," says the Biographia Dramatica, "and probably will ever continue to be, one of "the most standard and established amusements of "the British Stage.——The characters are natu-"ral, the dialogue genteel, and the wit entirely spi-"rited and genuine. In short, to say the least we "can in its praise, we can scarcely keep within the "limits assigned us; and, were we to say the most, "we could scarcely do justice to its merit (54)." The "Twin Rivals" has been asserted by the critics to be the most regular and complete of all Farquhar's dramatic works. But in this judgment there is not sufficient reason to acquiesce. For, although it may perhaps be allowed that the younger Wou'dbe, Mrs. Midnight, and Teague, are more highly drawn characters than any in our author's other comedies, it will probably appear, on a strict scrutiny, that they are so only, because they are more out of real life, more outré, or, if you please, more unnatural. There are as many improbabilities in the conduct of the plot (the greatest fault that can be laid to Farquhar's charge in general) as in almost any comedy he has written (55). Mr. Oldys has asserted, in note I, that "The Beau's Stratagem" is universally allowed to be our poet's master-piece. But to this assertion every one will not readily concede. The play has undoubtedly great merit, which will appear in a stronger light, when it is considered that it was begun and ended in six weeks, whilst the author laboured under a settled illness, that carried him off during the run of his piece. In a short advertisement he acknowledges his obligations to Mr. Wilks, and attributes to him the success of the comedy. But the frequency of its representation to the present time, and the pleasure it constantly affords, are proofs of its intrinsic excellence (56).

Farquhar's general character as a comic writer is well delineated in Cibber's Lives of the Poets. "He "seems," says the author of that work, "to have "been a man of a genius rather sprightly than great, "rather flowery than solid. His comedies are diverting, because his characters are natural, and such as "we frequently meet with: but he has used no art "in drawing them, nor does there appear any force "of thinking in his performances, or any deep penetration into nature; but rather a superficial view, "pleasant enough to the eye, though capable of "leaving no great impression on the mind. He drew "his observations chiefly from those he conversed "with, and has seldom given any additional heightening, or indelible marks of his characters; which "was the peculiar excellence of Shakespeare, Jonson, "and Congreve. Had he lived to have gained a "more general knowledge of life, or had his circumstances not been straightened, and so prevented his "mingling with persons of rank, we might have seen "his plays embellished with more finished characters, "and with a more polished dialogue. He had certainly a lively imagination; but then it was capable of no great compass. He had wit, but it was "of so peculiar a sort as not to gain ground upon "consideration; and it is true that his comedies in "general owe their success full as much to the player "as to any thing intrinsically excellent in themselves (57)."

(57) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. III. p. 136, 137.

Part of the estimate which we have of Farquhar in the Biographia Dramatica is as follows: "As a writer, the opinions of critics have been various. The "general character which has been given of his comedies is, that the success of most of them far exceeded the author's expectations; that he was particularly happy in the choice of his subjects, which "he always took care to adorn with a great variety "of characters and incidents; that his style is pure "and unaffected, his wit natural and flowing, and "his plots generally well contrived. But then, on "the contrary, it has been objected, that he was "too hasty in his productions; that his works are "loose, though indeed not so grossly libertine as "those of some other wits of his time; that his imagination, though lively, was capable of no great "compass; and his wit, though passable, not such "as would gain ground upon consideration.——On "the

" the whole, however, his pieces are very entertain-
" ing, and almoſt all of them, after nearly fourſcore
" years have paſſed over them, are ſtill ſome of the " greateſt favourites of the public (58)."

(58) Biographia Dramatica, Vol. II. p. 157.

We ſhall add Dr. Blair's ſhort character of our dramatic poet. " Farquhar," ſays the Doctor, " is a " light and gay writer; leſs correct, and leſs ſpark-" ling than Congreve; but he has more eaſe, and, " perhaps, fully as great a ſhare of the vis comica. " The two beſt, and leaſt exceptionable of his plays, " are the "Recruiting Officer," and "Beaux Strata-" gem." I ſay the leaſt exceptionable; for, in " general, the tendency of both Congreve and Far-" quhar's plays is immoral (59)." The juſt reflections, which are ſubjoined by Dr. Blair, on the licentiouſneſs of the comedies of that period, are inſerted in the addition to Congreve's article (60)].

 [FASTOLFF (JOHN), Knight, and Knight-Banneret, a valiant and renowned General, Governor, and Nobleman in France, during our conqueſts in that kingdom, under King Henry IV, V, and VI, of England, and Knight-Companion of the Moſt Noble Order of the Garter, has been ſuppoſed, from the title of his French barony, and from his name being ſo often corruptly mentioned in the French hiſtories, by occaſion of his long reſidence, and many engagements in the wars there, to have been born in France, at leaſt of French extraction. Others, allowing him to have been a native of England, have no leſs erroneouſly fixed his birth-place in Bedfordſhire: but it is well known, that he was deſcended of an antient and famous Engliſh family in the county of Norfolk; which had flouriſhed there, and in other parts of the kingdom, in very honourable diſtinction, before the Conqueſt [A]: and from a train of illuſtrious anceſtors, many of them dignified with the honour of knighthood, inveſted with very eminent employments, and poſſeſſed of extenſive patrimonies. But

[A] In very honourable diſtinction before the Conqueſt.] To paſs over the obſervation, that one Faſtolfe was Maſter of the Mint under king Edgar (1): and that Nicholas Faſtolff held lands in the ninth of Edward II. in Wykhampton, Redham, &c. in Norfolk (2): and in that year two fines were levied, the firſt (3) between John Faſtolff querent, Thomas Faſtolff parſon of Fekenham, and Nicholas Faſtolff, deforciants of lands in Caſtre and Great Yarmouth; and, by the ſecond, ſeveral lands in Yarmouth, and Fleg in Norfolk, and Reydon in Suffolk, were ſettled on the ſaid John, and Joan his wife, for their lives, remainder to Nicholas, ſon of John and Ida his wife in tail, remainder in fee to the right heirs of Joan. Nicholas was Chief Juſtice of Ireland (4) in the firſt of Edward III. and was a Juſtice Itinerant in Nottingham (5). And this Nicholas (6), ſon of John, with Ada his wife, ſettled lands in Caſtre, and other parts of Norfolk, and Reydon in Suffolk, on themſelves in tail; then to the heirs of Nicholas; remainder to John, ſon of John, in tail; remainder to Thomas and Richard, brothers to John. In the 20th year of that king, Alexander (7) held lands in Reppes; and in the 23d, Thomas ſon of Alexander held others in Yarmouth; and in the 35th this Thomas died, ſeized of large poſſeſſions. In the 48th John Faſtolff was looked upon as a man of ſuch abilities and fidelity, that he was ſent into foreign parts (8) upon ſome ſecret negotiation of high concern to the King; in which year Hugh Faſtolff of Great Yarmouth was Lieutenant to William Nevil the Admiral, as he had ten years before been to William Herle (9); which Hugh was brother of John Faſtolff. 51 E. III. occurs John the ſon of Hugh and Mary. In the firſt of king Richard II. the Earl of Warwick, Admiral, makes Sir John Faſtolff of Yarmouth his deputy, who, being a knight, had a protection in the third year (10), being then upon a naval expedition for the crown. Sir Hugh Faſtolff, his father, dying the 5th of Richard II. (11), he obtained a confirmation of free-warren in his demeſne lands of Caſtre and Thwayte firſt granted in the 44th of Henry III. to Robert Caſtre. Many other Knights and Eſquires of the name might be produced, and their extenſive territories named, eſpecially in the two counties here ſpecified; among whom, as it has been ſaid, the branch whence our Knight deſcended was ſeated at Caſtre, where John (12), ſon of Nicholas, appointed himſelf to be buried in the church of the Holy Trinity; where alſo there was a free chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt; to which John Faſtolff the elder (13) preſented in 1377; and John, ſon of Alexander, in 1383; and our religious Knight himſelf, about four years after his final return from the wars of France (14). His mother, dame Mary Faſtolff, who after his father's death was married to Sir Thomas Mortimer, died May 2, 1406, and was buried in the chapel or choir belonging to the chantry of the Holy Croſs. Her memory was honoured with an obit, anniverſary, and tomb, and there was an anniverſary kept for her ſoul in the college of his houſe at Caſtre, the ſame day they ſang it at Attleburgh. Sir Thomas Mortimer, eldeſt ſon of Sir Richard, in his will, dated Nov. 3, 1459, deſired his ſubſtance to be diſpoſed of in the beſt manner for the pleaſure of God and his ſoul's health, "and alſo for the releef, " ſocour, and helpe of the ſoules that I am moſt " oblyged to prey, and do preye for, and for the " ſoules of John Faſtolf my fader, dam Mary (the " doghter of Nicholas Park, ſquyer) my moder," &c.; and it appears that ſhe was buried in the chapel or choir belonging to the chantry of the Holy Croſs, at Attleburgh, by Sir Thomas Mortimer, her laſt huſband: for, in the ſame will, are theſe clauſes: "Item, " I wolle and ordeyne that, be the avys of myn exe-" cutours befor named, that proviſion and ordenaunce " be mad that the obyte and anniverſarye may be " yerly kept in perpetuite, with Placebo, and Dirige, " and Meſſe be note for the ſowle of dam Mary my " moder, and her aunceterys, in the chirche of Attil-" burgh, and than on of the monkes or preſtys in the " college by me ordeyned in the mancyon of Caſtre " foreteid ſhall ſynge ſpecyally in perpetuite for the " ſoule of my moder and off alle here aunceteres and " good doers. Item, I wole that, in ſemblable wiſe, " that a marbul ſton, of a convenient meſure, be or-" deyned and layd over dam Mary my modir, in the " chapell of the chauntry founded in the pariſſche " churche of Attilburgh, with an ymage of laton, " accordyng to her degre, with a ſcripture there abow-" ten of the day and yere of here obyte, with iiii " ſkochonys, whereof here iii huſbondes, Mortimer, " Faſtolf, and Farwelle, and the ferthe of her aunce-" terys armys." By this it appears, that ſhe had three huſbands; firſt, John Farwelle, of Cowling, Suffolk, then John Faſtolfe, and, laſtly, Sir Thomas Mortimer, and had iſſue by the two laſt, if not by the firſt, who died 1401. By Sir Thomas ſhe had three daughters, coheirs to Sir Robert, their grandfather (15); and by Faſtolff a ſon, the ſubject of this account, and Margaret, married to Sir —— Braunch, knt. (16).

There are ſtill in being in the regiſtry at Norwich, ſeveral preſentations, and laſt wills, of many others of this family, which are ſo numerous, ſo divided into ſeveral branches with the ſame chriſtian names, that by this means, and the frequent interchange of ſettlement, it becomes very difficult to deduce the pedigree of our Knight in a direct line, though there ſeems to be no doubt but he was the chief heir male, being ſeiſed of the antient patrimony of Caſtre. The Faſtolffs were alſo ſettled at Kimberley, where Sir John Wodehouſe, a favourite of Henry IV. pulled down their manſion-houſe (17).

one of the principal branches, being ſeated at Caſtre in Fl g near Great Yarmouth in that county, which eſtate deſcending to theſe anceſtors, he afterwards adorned with a noble family ſeat (a), it is preſumed he was born there, or in Yarmouth. His father was John Faſtolff, Eſq. of that town, a man of conſiderable account in thoſe and other parts, both for his means and merits, eſpecially for his public benefactions, pious foundations, &c. (b). His mother was Mary, daughter of Nicholas Park, Eſq. (c), and married to Sir Richard Mortimer, of Attleburgh; and this their ſon was born in the latter end of king Edward the IIIl'ds reign. As he died at the age of eighty, in 1459, his birth could not happen later than 1378. It may fairly be preſumed he was grounded as well in that learning and other accompliſhments which afterwards, improved by his experience and ſagacity, rendered him ſo famous in war and peace, as in thoſe virtuous and religious principles, which governed his actions to the laſt. His father dying before he was of age, the care of his perſon and eſtate were committed to one of the firſt noblemen in the kingdom. One author ſays, that he was ward to John duke of Bedford, who was afterwards the moſt wiſe and able Regent of France we ever had there; and, more expreſſly, that he was the laſt ward which that duke had (d); but we have been otherwiſe informed, that he was trained up in the Norfolk family (*), which will not appear improbable to thoſe who know it was not unuſual in thoſe times, for young noblemen whilſt under wardſhip to be trained under others, eſpecially Miniſters of State, in their houſes and families, as in academies of behaviour, and to qualify them for the ſervice of their country at home or abroad. But if he was under Thomas Mowbray duke of Norfolk, while he enjoyed that title, it could be but one year, that duke being baniſhed the kingdom by king Richard II. in 1398 [B], though his younger ſon, who was reſtored to that title many years after, might be one of Sir John Faſtolff's feoffees. And it is pretty evident, that he was, but a few years after the baniſhment of that duke, in ſome conſiderable poſt under Thomas of Lancaſter, afterwards Duke of Clarence, and ſecond ſon of the ſucceeding king Henry IV. This Thomas was ſent by his father ſo early, according to ſome writers, as the ſecond year of his reign, which was in 1401, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (e). And it is not improbable that Faſtolff was then with him; for we are informed by an hiſtorian who knew him, that in the ſixth and ſeventh years of the ſaid king Henry, that is, in 1405 and 1406, this John Faſtolff, Eſq. was continually with him (f). And the ſame Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was again there in 1408, 10 Henry IV. and almoſt to the beginning of the next year, when it is no leſs probable that Faſtolff was ſtill with him; for, in the year laſt mentioned, we find that he was married in that kingdom to a rich young widow of quality, named Milicent, Lady Caſtlecomb, daughter of Robert Lord Tiberot, and relict of Sir Stephen Scrope, knight; the ſame perhaps who is mentioned, though not with the title of knighthood, by Sir P. Leyceſter, to have been the ſaid Lord Lieutenant's Deputy of Ireland, during moſt of the intervals of his return to England; which Deputy-Lieutenant died in his office the ſame year. This marriage was ſolemnized in Ireland on the feaſt of St. Hilary the year aforeſaid; and Faſtolff bound himſelf in the ſum of a thouſand pounds, to pay her an hundred pounds a year, for pin-money (g) during life; and ſhe received the ſame to the 24th year of king Henry VI (h). The lands in Wiltſhire and Yorkſhire which came to Faſtolff by this marriage with the ſaid Lady, deſcended to Stephen Le Scrope, her ſon and heir. We may reaſonably believe, that this marriage in Ireland engaged his ſettlement in that kingdom, or upon his eſtate in Norfolk till his appointment to the command of ſome forces, or to ſome poſt of truſt, under the Engliſh regency in France, ſoon after required his reſidence in that kingdom. For, according to the ſtricteſt calculation we can make from the accounts of his early engagements in France, the many years he was there, and the time of his final return, it muſt be, not long after [B] That duke being baniſhed by king Richard II. in 1438.] This Thomas Mowbray was created Duke of Norfolk, on September 29, being the 21ſt of Richard II. anno 1397, as the monk of St. Albans records (18); and having charged Henry of Bolingbroke, duke of Hereford, with taxing the king of evil government, and he denying the ſame, a challenge enſued: which was ſo near being brought to a determination at Coventry, that they entered the liſts prepared at all points for the encounter. Duke Thomas's horſe was barbed with crimſon velvet, embroidered richly with his arms, in lions of ſilver, and with mulberry-trees for his rebus; to repreſent, according to the alluſive or ſymbolizing faſhion of thoſe days, his ſurname of Mowbray (19). But to prevent this combat, the Duke of Hereford was baniſhed, according to the monk of St. Albans, on the 13th of October, 1398, for ten years: and this Duke of Norfolk, for life (20). But, his adverſary being crowned a year after, by the name and title of Henry IV. the Duke of Norfolk died with grief at Venice, in the firſt year of the ſaid king's reign, anno 1400 (21). So that there is but a narrow ſpace of time that will admit our Faſtolff under the care, or in the ſervice, of this Duke of Norfolk, while he held that title in England. As for his two ſons; the eldeſt named alſo Thomas, was never Duke of Norfolk, for, being engaged in a conſpiracy againſt the king, he was five years after beheaded at York, with Archbiſhop Scroop (22); and his brother John was not reſtored to the title till the third of Henry VI. (23), and yet might after that be, as we are informed he was, one of Sir John Faſtolff's feoffees (24).

his ſaid marriage, that he left either England or Ireland, for that foreign ſervice: being employed abroad by Henry IV. V. and VI. in the wars in France, Normandy, Anjou, Mayne, and Guyenne, upwards of forty years. Which agrees very well, with what our firſt Engliſh printer has publiſhed, in his conciſe, yet comprehenſive character of him, little more than twenty years after his death, where he ſpeaks of his "exercifyng the Warrys in the Royame of Fraunce and other "Countrees, &c. by Fourty Yeres enduryng (k)." So that, we cannot ſee any room, either in the time or the temper, in the fortunes or employments of this our worthy, for him to have been a companion with, or follower and corrupter of Prince Henry, in his juvenile and diſſolute courſes; nor, that Shakſpeare had any view of drawing his Sir John Falſtaff, from any part of this Sir John Faſtolff's character; or ſo much as pointing at any indifferent circumſtance in it, that can reflect upon his memory, with readers converſant in the true hiſtory of him. The one is an old, humorous, vapouring, and cowardly, lewd, lying, and drunken debauchee, about the Prince's court, when the other was a young and grave, diſcreet and valiant, chaſte and ſober, commander abroad; continually advanced to honours and places of profit, for his brave and politic atchievements, military and civil; continually preferred to the truſt of one government or other; of countries, cities, towns, &c. or as a general, and commander of armies in martial expeditions while abroad; made Knight-Banneret in the field of battle; Baron in France, and Knight of the Garter in England: and particularly, when finally ſettled at home, conſtantly exerciſed in acts of hoſpitality, munificence, and charity; a founder of religious buildings, and other ſtately edifices ornamental to his country, as their remains ſtill teſtify; a generous patron of worthy and learned men, and a public benefactor to the pious and the poor; not only on this ſide, but even beyond, his grave. In ſhort, the more we compare the circumſtances in this Hiſtorical character, with thoſe in that Poetical one, we can find nothing diſcreditable in the latter, that has any relation to the former, or that would miſlead an ignorant reader to miſtake or confound them, but a little quibble, which makes ſome conformity in their names, and a ſhort degree in the time wherein the one did really, and the other is feigned to live. And, in regard to the Prince of Wales, or our Knight's being engaged in any wild or riotous practices of his youth, the improbabilities may alſo appear from the compariſon of their age, and a view of this Prince's commendable engagements [C], till that ſpace of time in which he indulged his interval of irregularaties,

[C] The improbabilities may alſo appear from the compariſon of their age, and a view of the Prince's commendable engagements, &c.] This Prince Henry, born in South Wales, 1388, was the eldeſt ſon of Henry of Bolingbroke, ſpoken of in the laſt note, afterwards King of England. During his father's exile in 1398, he was taken by Richard II. to Ireland, and impriſoned in the caſtle of Trim. He was afterwards ſome time a ſtudent in Queen's College in Oxford, under his half uncle (25), Henry Beaufort, who was that year Chancellor of the ſaid Univerſity. (26). Richard was depoſed; and the Prince's father, Henry IV. crowned in October, 1399, and, the Prince being arrived at the age of twelve years in 1400, had the ſucceſſion entailed on him in Parliament, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal, Earl of Cheſter, and ſoon after Duke of Aquitaine. From Oxford he was called to court, where Thomas Percy, Earl of Worceſter, was his governor, whoſe hoſtile attempts at the battle of Shrewſbury in July, 1403, coſt that diſloyal Earl his head (27), and this Prince Henry almoſt his life; who, confronting the Percies in battle, was wounded in the face with an arrow; but this badge of honour, and the overthrow of Henry Percy, by others called young Hotſpur, were hopeful tokens of his enſuing ſucceſs againſt Owen Glendour in Wales, whom he purſued to deſtruction, being then ſcarcely ſixteen: but, if he purſued Owen to his death on the Welch mountains, it ſeems to have been beyond 1404, two or three years or more (28), yet before he was miſled to any libertine courſes (however, on the ſtage, he is improbably repreſented in the height of them before he was fifteen), and after Faſtolff was engaged in the ſervice of Prince Henry's brother, Thomas of Lancaſter, afterwards Duke of Clarence. Falſtaff, in the play, appears to have been in the battle of Shrewſbury with Prince Henry; but Faſtolff, in hiſtory, appears not there; being probably in Ireland with, or by the appointment of, the ſaid Thomas of Lancaſter, from his firſt going Lord Lieutenant thither; where our Knight ſhould then appear, in order to make out the forty years ſervice of Sir John Faſtolff, in France and other countries, as Caxton has above declared; and we compute, by the time that Prince Henry had appeaſed the tumults in Wales, and diſturbances in other countries, ſo as to be ſettled in any tolerable quiet or tranquillity at home, Faſtolff was married and ſettled in Ireland: ſoon after which, it muſt be allowed, that he was ſent by King Henry into France, to anſwer the thirty years, and more, he expreſſes himſelf above to have reſided in that kingdom. The interval between Faſtolff's marriage in 1408, or departure to France, and the King's death in England, 1412, is the only room we can ſee for the Prince's diſorderly excurſions; for, it was not before he was of years beyond the command of tutors (29), however in the play he may appear in the midſt of them, before the battle of Shrewſbury; ſo that we ſee as little vacancy for our Faſtolff's being a partaker of them, in hiſtory or chronology, as there was probability he ſhould then, or any other time, be ſuch, in his more ſolid age and diſpoſition. He was at leaſt ten or eleven years older than the Prince; old enough to diſreliſh his youthful extravagances; yet no ſuch diſparity in their age as that he could be properly repreſented by the old, grey-headed, unwieldy buffoon and debauchee, who appears ſuch a ſubject of deriſion on the ſtage. If Faſtolff had ever been a corrupter of the Prince, King Henry would never have preferred him to any poſts of honour or truſt; nor would the Prince himſelf, when he came reclaimed to the crown, have advanced him ſtill higher; but have diſcarded him with a ſum of money, or ſtipend, as he did the libertines and paraſites who had ſoothed him in his vices. His frolicks of robbing, in company with them, his own ſtewards of his own money, and making them amends at the foot of their accounts (30); his attempt to reſcue one of his accomplices, whether Bardolf, or any other, in the Court of King's Bench, from ties, when the diſtance of our Knight will clear him from being a promoter of, or partaker in, them. For, it is apparent, that he had been entruſted with a command in from the courſe of the law, and raſhly ſtriking the Chief Juſtice, Sir William Gaſcoyne, on the bench, for which he ſuffered impriſonment (31), were actions countenanced by men of other principles, diſpoſition, and conduct, than Faſtolff. But there are ſo many other diſagreements, which remove all ſimilitude between them, that the honours of the real Knight cannot be affected by the humours of the fictitious one. That commitment, by the ſaid judge, of Falſtaff to the Fleet-priſon in the play (32), was when Faſtolff, in hiſtory, had manifeſtly been a good while in France. In the play, Falſtaff is a man of mean, neceſſitous, ſhifting circumſtances throughout; Faſtolff, in record, was richly poſſeſſed of lands and eſtates in ſeveral places from his youth. Falſtaff, in the Poet's account, was near threeſcore before the battle of Shrewſbury (33); Faſtolff, in hiſtory, not above twenty-ſix. The theatrical Falſtaff ends his life ſoon after his princely companion aſcends the throne, and before he goes into France (34), but the hiſtorical Faſtolff demonſtratively ſurvived that King Henry V. no leſs than thirty-ſeven years. As to its being ſaid of the one, that he was a Page to the Duke of Norfolk (35), as we have before read, that the other was alſo trained up in the Norfolk family, there is nothing but what was reputable in that, ſince, in thoſe times, it was the cuſtom for Lords and Dukes themſelves to be ſo trained: nor does this ſeem a foundation ſo premeditated, ſo perſonally pointed at our Knight, ſo deeply or widely laid, as to intend the fixing a credit in ſo many falſe circumſtances upon one that may be true; ſince it was probably, and might be as truly ſaid of Oldcaſtle as Faſtolff: for, the Poet firſt drew the character of his Sir John Falſtaff in Sir John Oldcaſtle's name; but being thereby thought to have diſpleaſed ſome deſcendants, or at leaſt made too free with ſuch an early and eminent inſtrument, or advancer of, and ſufferer for, our reformation, the Poet was obliged to change the name, from one that might have well enough implied the old battered bravo we ſee repreſented, to one that might as well expreſs other parts of the ſame character, by a ſtaff that was falſe in its ſoundneſs, or ſtrength for ſupport, and as little to be relied, or depended on, as a broken reed. Then, our Faſtolf appearing conſpicuous, though diſperſedly, in the old hiſtories of that Prince's time, yet through the want of diſtinct revival, being become much unknown to common fame in the Poet's days, might readily hint ſuch an eaſy variation, or tranſpoſition of the letters in his name, as would anſwer that purpoſe; but nothing in all his ſtory, that we have met with, could hint the character. That ſuch change of thoſe famous names in hiſtory, or ſubſtitution of one for the other, was made by the Poet, we may be ſatisfied from his own words; where he ſays, 'If you be not too much 'cloyed with fat meat, our humble author will con-'tinue the ſtory with Sir John in it, and make you 'merry with fair Catharine of France; where, for 'any thing I know, Falſtaff ſhall die of a ſweat, un-'leſs already he be killed with your hard opinions; 'for, Oldcaſtle died a martyr, and this is not the 'man (36).' And yet the freedom thought by ſome grave writers to have been taken with both, has given them offence, notwithſtanding that Sir John's name in the play is not, according to the ſtrictneſs of the letter, to be found in hiſtory. 'The Comedian,' ſays one author, 'is not excuſable by ſome alteration 'of his name, ſeeing the vicinity of ſounds intrenches 'on the memory of that worthy Knight; and few do 'heed the inconſiderable difference in ſpelling their 'names (37).' Then, in regard to the ſubſtitution of one perſon for the other, he ſays in one place, 'Stage Poets have themſelves been very bold with, 'and others very merry at, the memory of Sir John 'Oldcaſtle; whom they have fancied a boon com-'panion, a jovial royſter, and yet a coward to boot; 'contrary to the credit of all chronicles, owning him 'a martial man of merit. The beſt is, Sir John 'Falſtaff hath relieved the memory of Sir John Old-'caſtle, and of late is ſubſtituted buffoon in his place; 'but it matters as little what petulant Poets as what 'malicious Papiſts have written againſt him (38).' In another place, the ſame author again has theſe words of Sir John Faſtolff: 'To avouch him by many argu-'ments valiant is to maintain that the ſun is bright; 'though ſince the ſtage have been over-bold with his 'memory, making him a thraſonical puff and em-'blem of mock-valour. True it is, Sir John Old-'caſtle was the make-ſport in all plays for a coward. 'It is eaſily known out of what purſe this black penny 'came; the Papiſts railing on him for a heretic (39), 'and therefore he muſt alſo be a coward; though in-'deed a man of arms every inch of him, and as vali-'ant as any in his age. Now as I am glad that Sir 'John Oldcaſtle is put out, ſo I am ſorry that Sir 'John Faſtolff is put in, to relieve his memory, in 'this baſe ſervice to be the anvil for every dull wit to 'ſtrike upon (40).' But as other Dramatiſts before Shakeſpeare had made free with Oldcaſtle, they ought to bear the firſt blame, and a larger ſhare of it, as they had taken greater liberties, though with leſs wit. For, there was a play of Henry the Vth before Shakeſpeare's, in which Oldcaſtle is in the gang of robbers with the Prince (41); but there is a ſcene in which the Prince ſtrikes the Judge a box on the ear, whereas in Shakeſpeare, this action is more modeſtly ſunk into a narrative. Then afterwards, as the ſame character ſerves, if you will, for Faſtolff, as well as it did for Oldcaſtle, this ſhews there was no particular ſatire intended by him upon one or the other. Mr. Rowe, who firſt publiſhed Shakeſpeare in a ſmall edition, inclines to think him ſomewhat to blame, in this his ſecond choice of perſonating our Knight, Sir John Faſtolff, being a name of diſtinguiſhed merit in the wars of France, &c. (42), though he afterwards found ſome colourable pretext for excuſing him from the miſconſtruction of a much-commended retreat he made to the preſervation of his army, as will be hereafter related: and a later author yet has, by ſome ſtrong reflections upon Shakeſpeare's picture of Falſtaff, taken the notion alſo, that our Knight was directly deſigned to be expoſed therein, where he inſtances that 'as of old the reputation of Socrates was 'in his life-time ſullied by Ariſtophanes, in per-'ſonating him on the ſtage; ſo the memory of our 'hero had, in this laſt age, met with the ſame hard 'fate by interludes in plays (43);' yet, a little farther, he owns that Shakeſpeare cannot be charged with any premeditated ſpleen againſt the memory of our Knight, when he compoſed his Comedies, as he ſubſtituted Sir John Faſtolff for Sir John Oldcaſtle, which might be done at random, ſince his firſt deſign was evidently no more than to entertain the theatre with a fat, amorous, vain, cowardly, drunken, old fellow, the corrupter of Henry V. while Prince, as the ſubject of mirth and ridicule: 'and it muſt be 'confeſſed, that he has performed his deſign with in-'comparable wit, and inimitable humour, which have 'made ſuch laſting impreſſions on the generality of 'ſpectators, that they have been induced or bewitched 'into a belief that this drollery was a piece of true 'hiſtory (44).' We might produce ſome grave poetry alſo, written by authors on this ſubject, who entertained the ſame opinion. But as we have elſewhere quoted ſome of it from an hiſtorical poem in MS. we ſhall here only add part of two other ſtanzas from the ſame, where, though ſcandal is believed, in this ſtage-mirth, to purſue the ſteps of honour, yet if truth may ſettle our opinion, we may be ſatisfied, command in France ſome time before the death of king Henry IV; becauſe, in 1413, the very firſt year of his ſon, who was now grown the reformed, and ſoon after proved the renowned, Henry V; it appears that Faſtolff had the caſtle and dominion of Veires in Gaſcoigne committed to his cuſtody and defence (l): whence it is very reaſonably inferred, that he then reſided in the ſaid duchy, which at that time was poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. In June, 1415, Faſtolff, then only an Eſquire, was returned, by indenture, with ten men of arms, and thirty archers, to ſerve the King at his arrival in France (m). But, perhaps, it has not been cautiouſly enough conſidered, whether there may not be ſome inadvertency in theſe applications? whether diſcredit may not be appropriated thereby, where it was never deſigned? Could it be ſuppoſed that Shakſpeare's natural candour and impartiality in other characters had been warped in this, by any intereſt in, or reſpect towards, the Shrewſbury family, on account of ſome antiquated emulation or difference between John Lord Talbot, the moſt renowned anceſtor of that family, and Sir John Faſtolff in France; a man of that Poet's incomparable abilities could have made a ſubſtantial ſatire of it; could have burleſqued Faſtolff, as well as any body elſe, out of hiſtory, and transformed ſome incidents, really graceful, into a character no leſs groteſque. But upon whom does the horſing of a dead corps on Falſtaff's back reflect (47)? whoſe honour ſuffers, in his being forced by the unexpected ſurpriſe of his armed plunderers to ſurrender his treaſure (48)? whoſe policy is impeached by his creeping into a bucking-baſket to avoid the ſtorms of a jealous huſband (49)? whoſe reputation ſuffers by his being buffeted in the diſguiſe of an old witch, or fortune-teller, of Brentford (50)? or whoſe valour is to be called in queſtion, becauſe he cannot avoid being tormented by a ſwarm of little fairies in Windſor-foreſt (51)? If the good name of Faſtolff, or any other man of honour, had ever been maliciouſly doomed to be ſacrificed to durable diſgrace or expoſure, in the character of Falſtaff, it would have been founded upon ſome important, ſome ſignificant tranſactions, ſome inſtances of flagitious and irreputable miſconduct, not ſuch odd, droll, inconſiderable, circumſtances as theſe, the harmleſs iſſue of pleaſant wit and humour, or delightful union of nature and fancy; all ſo viſibly deviſed of the comic ſtrain, ſo deſigned only for innocent merriment and diverſion, without any perſonal reflection on this great man, or any other, that we believe there is no real character to be read of in all hiſtory, that can be juſtly diſparaged by any application, diſcernibly intended, of this imaginary one in poetry. But if, after this, ſucceeding readers or ſpectators, whether Antiquaries, Heralds, Hiſtorians, or Poets, will indulge the like auſterity with ſome of their predeceſſors, will ſtill captiouſly conceive that character to have been directly levelled at this Knight, and ſtill, with more rigour than candour, equity, or reaſon, poſſeſs themſelves, that any ſterling coin, or plate of the true ſtandard, was ever meant to be any way forged, or imitated, by a piece of metal of the moſt diſſimilar mixture or allay; which, neither in weight or colour, form, ſtamp, or inſcription, bears any reſemblance; which pretends not to uſurp ſo much as the very name, but only borders upon it: if any, I ſay, will cheriſh their credulity ſo far as this, and the Falſtaff of the Comedians muſt be ſtill taken for the Faſtolff of Chronologiſts, inſtead of exclaiming ſeriouſly, or with ſober ſadneſs in hiſtory, againſt the poetical injury, let a reparation be made by poetical juſtice; and, for the falſe character impoſed under the name of Falſtaff, let the real one appear, in the valiant and vigilant, truſty and incorruptible, politic and prudent, temperate and continent, Sir John Faſtolff; in the brave and experienced ſoldier, the wiſe and able ſtateſman, the ſteady patriot, the generous patron, and the pious benefactor. It would be a labour that might ſurely well reward itſelf, were it judiciouſly executed, to produce a rich and ſolid figure, of ſuch an original, as might put all copies out of countenance; of ſuch native brightneſs, as would eclipſe all feigned luſtre, or detrimental efficacy in any effigial counterfeit; and ſublimely to eſſay, whether the fictitious Falſtaff of Shakſpeare, ſo admirably figured out by art, like Spenſer's falſe Florimel, ſo artfully imaged out of ſnow, would ſhrink and diſſolve away at the preſence of the true one (52). But, whether it be ever effected or not, we may ſafely let the name of Falſtaff preſerve its corruption, without impairing Faſtolff's merit, as the name of Epicurus, though diſtorted to ſignify voluptuous gormandry and carnal delight, yet injured not the man among the the wiſeſt philoſophers: we may let ſign-painters draw the picture of Sir John Falſtaff before the doors of drinking-houſes, but, if Faſtolff's reputation ſuffers, it muſt be in nobler company; and if the biographers of highwaymen make Falſtaff the Captain-General of them, which cannot in juſtice be done without diſplacing his gallant prince, even any hiſtorical highwayman cannot rob Faſtolff of the honours, due to his long, toilſome, and ſignal, ſervices. For a concluſion of this long diſcuſſion, ſuffice it to refer our readers to Mr. Steevens's note on the beginning of Shakſpeare's Henry V. in which he ſhews that a play on the ſubject of Oldcaſtle was written before Shakſpeare's time, deſpicable, and full of ribaldry and impiety from the firſt ſcene to the laſt. Shakſpeare ſeems to have taken not a few hints from it; for, it comprehends in ſome meaſure the ſtory of the two parts of Henry IV. as well as of Henry V.; and no ignorance could debaſe the gold of Shakſpeare into ſuch droſs, though no chemiſtry but that of Shakſpeare could exalt ſuch baſe metal into gold. When the Prince of Wales calls Falſtaff my old lad of the caſtle, it is probably but a ſneering alluſion to the deſerved fate which this performance met with; for, there is no proof that our poet was ever obliged to change the name of Oldcaſtle into that of Falſtaff, though there is an abſolute certainty that this piece muſt have been condemned by any audience before whom it was ever repreſented.

——howe'er the heaps

And a little farther, after having ſaid what may ſuffice to do right to our hero, let the guilt fall where it may, ſince the election made by Henry of his officers and miniſters was unqueſtionable; and judge-

Mr. Drake, in his "Account of ſome Diſcoveries "in the Church of Brotherton, in Yorkſhire (53)," has introduced Sir John Faſtolff, and entered into a diſquiſition concerning the manner in which he has been treated by Shakſpeare. It is Mr. Drake's opinion that there was ſomething defective in his military character, and that he did not do his duty at the battle of Patay. In confirmation of this charge he produces what he deems a proof of the odium in which Sir John Faſtolff was held at that time, but can only prove the fineſſe and art of a rebel commander to blacken his ſovereign's loyal ſubject. This, and the ſtory of Monſtrelet about his being degraded from the order of the garter, is all that Mr. Drake offers, in juſtification of the poet, for painting him in the infamous colours he has done in his hiſtorical plays. At the ſame time Mr. Drake gives all due credit to the evidence to the contrary from the regiſters of the Order. He obſerves, that in the chapter of Aſhmole, which treats particularly of degradation, though he has mentioned all who ſuffered that indignity, he takes not the leaſt notice of Sir John's having incurred a ſimilar infamy, which he certainly would have done, had he met with any foundation in hiſtory for ſuch an aſſertion. It is farther remarked by Mr. Drake, that the ſtyle which Archbiſhop Bourchier uſes towards the Knight is moſt reſpectful, and can only be applicable to the pureſt and moſt illuſtrious of characters (54).

find it in others, the King, upon this conqueſt, conſtituted his ſaid uncle Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorſet and Duke of Exeter, Governor of Harfleur, in conjunction with Sir John Faſtolff, and, having repaired the fortifications, placed therein a garriſon of two thouſand ſelect men, as Titus Livius numbers them; or of fifteen hundred men at arms, and thirty-five knights, according to Hall's account; to which number one of the French hiſtorians alſo adds a thouſand archers (p). Towards the latter end of October, in the year laſt mentioned, he was dangerouſly engaged in the ever-memorable battle of Agincourt, where the Engliſh, under their heroic monarch, obtained one of the moſt glorious victories upon record throughout their annals. And there it is ſaid that Faſtolff, among others, ſignalized himſelf moſt gallantly by taking the duke of Alençon priſoner (q); though other hiſtorians ſay that duke was ſlain after a deſperate encounter with king Henry himſelf, in which he cut off the crowned creſt of the king's helmet (r). The fact is, that, in a ſucceeding battle, Faſtolff did take this duke's ſon and ſucceſſor priſoner [D]. In the ſame year, 1415, he, with the duke and 3000 Engliſh, invaded Normandy, and penetrated almoſt to Rouen; but on their return, loaded with booty, they were ſurpriſed and forced to retreat towards Harfleur, whither the enemy purſuing them were totally defeated. The Conſtable of France, to recover his credit, laid ſiege to Harfleur, which made a vigorous defence under Sir John Faſtolff and others till relieved by the fleet under the duke of Bedford. He was at the taking of the caſtle of Tonque, the city of Caen, the caſtle of Courcy, the city of Sees, and town of Falaiſe, and at the great ſiege at Rouen, 1417. For his ſervices at the latter he was made governor of Conde Noreau (s); and for his eminent ſervices in thoſe victories, he received, before the 29th of January following, the honour of knighthood, and had the manor and demeſne of Fritenſe near Harfleur beſtowed upon him during life (t). In the year 1418, he was ordered to ſeize upon the caſtle and dominion of Bec Creſpin, and other manors, which were held by James D'Auricher, and ſeveral other knights; and had the ſaid caſtle, with thoſe lands, granted him in ſpecial tail (u), to the yearly value of 2000 ſcutes (w). In 1420 he was at the ſiege of Monſterau, as Peter Baſſet has recorded; and, in the next year, at that of Meaulx-en-Brie. About five months after the deceaſe of king Henry V. the town of Meulent having been ſurprized in January, 1422, John Duke of Bedford Regent of France, and Sir John Faſtolff then Grand Maſter of his Houſehold, and Seneſchal of Normandy, laid ſiege to the ſame, and re-took it. In 1423, after the caſtle of Cravent was relieved, our knight was conſtituted Lieutenant for the King and Regent in Normandy, in the juriſdictions of Rouen, Evreux, Alençon, and the countries beyond the river Seine: alſo Governor of the countries of Anjou and Maine, and before the battle of Verneuil was created Banneret (x). About three months after, being then Captain of Alençon, and governor of the marches thereof, he laid ſiege to the caſtle of Tenuye in Maine, as a French hiſtorian informs us (y), which was ſurrendered to him; and, in [D] Did take this duke's ſon and ſucceſſor priſoner.] John II. duke of Alençon, ſon of him who was ſlain at Agincourt, was born in 1409, and taken priſoner at the battle of Verneuil in 1424. He was detained a priſoner three years, but releaſed at the interceſſion of the duke of Burgundy, on paying a ranſom of 200,000 crowns. He was afterwards convicted of treaſon towards his own ſovereign, and died in priſon, 1476. Sir John, in a letter dated Feb. 5, 1455, ſays, there was "due to the lord Willoughby and to "him 10,000 marks (6666l. 13s. 4d.) for a reward "to be paid of my lord Bedford's goods for the ta-"king of Alençon. And the ſaid lord Willoughby "had but one thouſand marks (666l. 13s. 4d.) paid, "and I one thouſand marks, ſo 8000 remaineth "yet to pay," &c. It may be ſuppoſed that the ranſom was paid into the duke of Bedford's hand as commander in chief, and that in that character he was entitled to a conſiderable ſhare of it, though it appears from this account that he had detained moſt of it, for even now, at the diſtance of twenty years from his death, the lord Willoughby and Sir John Faſtolff had received only 1000 marks each. See Sir John Fenn's Original Letters of the Paſton family, Letter XXVIII. vol. I. pp. 120—125. In the account of moneys due from the King to Sir John, Ibid. III. 267, it is ſtated that 4000 marks (2666l. 13s. 4d.) were owing to him; and from the duke of Bedford's eſtate, for various loans and charges of keeping caſtles and parks, 4599 marks. It appears that Faſtolff purchaſed the manor of Weſt Thurrock in Eſſex, and ſold it to the duke of Bedford, in 1420 or 1429, for 300 marks, Ibid. IV. 29. We are elſewhere informed, the Duke of Bar was taken by him; and yet that could not be in the battle of Agincourt; for, we find that, among the French Princes and Lords who fell in ſuch numbers there, Edward Duke of Bar, and John his brother, were both ſlain in the field (55). There was another Duke of Bar, who, after the ſiege of Orleans, appears to have brought ſuccours to Charles VII. the young King of France (56); and this might be the priſoner meant by Drayton, in his grave hiſtorical work, though written in antient Engliſh verſe, where he is characterizing our old hardy warriors in the conqueſt of France, &c. and, having briefly deſcribed the bravery of that ſtout Sir Philip Hall (57), who regained Crotoy, and obtained ſuch an admirable victory over the proud Clermont, he makes this compariſon:

Strong Faſtolff with this man compare we may;
By Sal'ſbury who, oft being ſeriouſly employ'd,
In many a brave attempt, the gen'ral foe annoy'd
With excellent ſucceſs in Maine, and Anjou fought,
And many a bulwark there into our keeping brought;
And choſen to go forth with Vaudemont in war,
Moſt reſolutely took proud Renate Duke of Barre (58).

He took alſo one Guill'm Ramond (perhaps the governor of the caſtle of Pacy, which Sir John took 1423), who was ranſomed, and agreed to pay him for his ranſom 3200 ſaluts (59), but without his knowledge or licence was taken from him by the duke of Bedford, and yielded to the king, with the town of Compeyn; and, after long ſuits to the king and council, was recompenſed but to the value of 1600 ſaluts in lands in Normandy, when they fortuned to fall into the king's hands, which lands he has alſo loſt to the value of 4000 marks, beſides the reſidue of the ranſom (60).

1424,

1424, he was ſent to oppoſe the delivery of Alençon to the French, upon a diſcovery made that a Gaſcoigner (z) had ſecretly contracted to betray the ſame [E]. In September, 1425, he laid ſiege to Beaumont le Vicompt, which ſurrendered to him (a). Then alſo he took the caſtle of Sillie-le-Guillem [F], from which he was dignified with the title of Baron: but this, revolting afterwards again to the French, was aſſaulted by the Earl of Arundel (b), and retaken about ſeven years after. In the year laſt mentioned, our active warrior took alſo St. Ouen D'Eſtrais, near Laval, as likewiſe the caſtle of Gravelle, with other places of ſtrength, from the enemy; for which dangerous and indefatigable ſervice in France he was about the ſame time elected in England, with extraordinary deference to his merits, Knight Companion of the Order of the Garter [G]. In 1426, John Lord Talbot was appointed Governor of Anjou and Maine, and Sir John Faſtolff was removed to another place of command (c), which, in all probability, might be the foundation of that jealouſy, emulation, or competition, between them, which never was cordially reconciled. In October, 1428, he had a protection granted him, being then going into France (d); and there he performed an enterpriſe of ſuch bravery and conduct as is ſcarcely thought to have been paralleled in ancient or modern hiſtory (e). The Engliſh army, at the ſiege of Orleans, being in great want of proviſions, artillery, and other neceſſaries, Sir John Faſtolff, with ſome other approved commanders, was diſpatched for ſupplies, by William de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, to the Regent at Paris; who not only provided him plentifully therewith, but allowed him a ſtrong guard at his return, that he might convey the ſame ſafely to the ſiege. The French, knowing the importance of this ſuccour, united two armies of very ſuperior numbers and force to meet him; but, either in different encounters, or in a pitched battle, as the French themſelves allow, he totally overthrew them; ſlew greater numbers than he had under his command, not to mention the wounded and

[E] To betray the ſame.] The treaty, made between the Lord Scales Mareſchal and Sir John Faſtolff, knt. Grand Maſter of the Duke of Bedford Regent of France, and Sir John Montgomery, Knight, Commiſſioners and Deputies, to reduce the county of Maine to the King's obedience of one part; and the captain's men of the fortreſs of Salle Leguille, dated 1ſt of October, 1424; and king Henry the Sixth, his commiſſion to them, dated 25 Auguſt, 1424; may be ſeen in a thin octavo book in the office of arms library, firſt preſs, uppermoſt ſhelf, wooden cover, fol. 55.

[F] The caſtle of Sillie-le-Guillem. The ſaid Faſtolff having the gift of the baronies and lordſhip of Sillie Guillem and Laſuze, in the county of Mayne, to him and his aſſigns for ever, the which were gotten by the ſaid Faſtolff, and no charge to the king for the value and number of 4000 ſaluts of yearly rent, he was commanded by the king's letter to deliver up the ſaid baronies and lordſhip to the king's commiſſioners; promiſing him by the king's commandment to be recompenſed therefore, as the ſaid Faſtolff hath to ſhew, and he not recompenſed nor rewarded nothing for the leaving of the ſaid baronies and lordſhip, to the damages of the ſaid Faſtolff of the ſum of 2500 marks.

[G] About the ſame time elected Knight of the Garter.] The Duke of Bedford did, before or after Sir John Faſtolff's election, in a very particular and perſuaſive manner, recommend to the Sovereign and other Knights of the Garter, the election of Sir John Radcliffe alſo into the ſaid order, for his martial valour and virtues, his long faithful and ſignal ſervices to his country; having 'exercyſed the armys, the ſpace of 'XXVIII wynters unreproched (61):' yet, upon the vacancy of a ſtall at Windſor, by the death of the Earl of Weſtmoreland, and a ſcrutiny made, on St. George's Eve, in the 4th of Henry VI. in which it was found, that Sir John Faſtolff, and Sir John Radcliffe, were not only nominated by a greater number before the other Knights of great merits, but by an equal number of votes, the ſaid Duke being then the King's deputy and preſident at that election, did of the two, though both, as he ſaid, were indeed undeniably deſerving of this honour, judge, Sir John Faſtolff to be moſt worthy of it; and, according to his authority, did declare him admitted into the place of the deceaſed (62), and Radcliffe was elected ſoon after upon another vacancy; which preference, to ſuch an extraordinary competitor, by ſuch an able and unblemiſhed, ſuch an honourable and unbiaſſed, judge, muſt imply very high deſerts, in the receiver then abroad, of that exalted honour. In the letter ſent by, or in the name of, King Henry VI. to Sir John Faſtolff, importing his election, there are theſe words:—'Conſide-'rant, tans les bons, leaux, & honourable ſervices, 'que avez de pie cà faiz, en ſervice de noſtre tres 'redoutê Seigneur & Pere, que Dieux aſſoille, & que 'faitez continuelement en noſtre; come pluſeurs 'autres deſertes d'onnour, que Dieux a ſouffert eſtre 'en vous, en tollerant tousjours, comme bon & feal 'ſubject, les paines & travaulx de guerre, pour noſtre 'bon droit, & juſte querelle ſuſteiner, vous a eſleu un 'de noz compaignons du dit ordre (63) &c.' As much as to ſay, 'In conſideration of your good, loyal, 'and honourable ſervices, heretofore performed, to 'our moſt redoubted Lord and Father, whom God 'abſolve, and which you are inceſſantly exerciſing 'under us; as well as for other deſerts of honour, 'wherewith God hath endowed you, and diſpoſed 'you, ſo conſtantly upon all occaſions, like a true and 'faithful ſubject, to endure the pains and toils of war, 'in ſupport of our full right and juſt quarrel; we 'have elected you one of our companions of the ſaid 'order, &c.' A commiſſion was alſo iſſued to the Earls of Warwick, Saliſbury, and Suffolk, to receive Sir John's oath, and to inveſt him with the Garter; farther directing, that he ſhould, with all convenient diſpatch, ſend over his helmet and ſword, to be hung up in the chapel at Windſor; and depute an honourable Knight, of untainted character, to take poſſeſſion of his ſtall (64). Accordingly the deputation of Sir John Faſtolff, to Sir Henry Inghouſe, and Sir William Breton, appointing them jointly and ſeparately his proctors, to take poſſeſſion of his ſtall; to offer his mantle, helmet, and ſword; and to take the oath required by the ſtatutes; as it was written in French, and dated from Lancone, the 3d of February, was ſent to them, and is alſo preſerved (65). And the Royal Commiſſion, directed to Sir John Robeſſart, one of the Knights Companions of the Order, for the inſtallation of him, by Sir Henry Inghouſe, one of the ſaid Proctors, is dated from the King's caſtle of Wallingford, the 25th of February, 1426, and in the 5th year of the ſaid King Henry VI. wherein to the character given again of Sir John, much in the tenor of the former, there is the addition made, of his great ſenſe, courage, and experience in arms (66). According to the tenor of theſe inſtruments (67), he was elected at the next inſtallation; and theſe are honourable teſtimonies of his perſonal qualifications and virtues; and of his fortitude, and merit in public ſervices (68).

the priſoners; and conducted his convoy ſafe to the Engliſh camp. And becauſe it was in the time of Lent, and he had, among his other proviſion, ſeveral of his carriages laden with many barrels of herrings, which he applied to form a fortification, the French have ever ſince called this victory "The Battle of Herrings [H]." But that the fortune of war is precarious, our Knight was a witneſs; who found it as neceſſary in his next adventure to exerciſe his conduct as in the laſt his courage. For, ſoon after, the Engliſh army was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans; though they received recruits from the Duke of Bedford, they were in no degree ſtrong enough to encounter the French army at Patay. At the battle which happened there in June, 1429, many of the Engliſh, who were of moſt experienced and approved valour, ſeeing themſelves ſo unequal, and the onſet of the French ſo unexpected, that nothing but inevitable

[H] The Battle of Herrings.] This battle is famous in hiſtory. Father Daniel, after having recorded the death of that valiant Thomas Montague, Earl of Saliſbury, who began the ſiege of Orleans; and mentioned the other Engliſh Commanders, of greateſt diſtinction who lay before that town; ſuch as the Earl of Suffolk, the Lords Talbot and Scales; Faſtolff, and Glacidas, as he is called (69), whoſe merits, ſupplying the place of his birth, had raiſed him to the higheſt offices of command in the army; proceeds to obſerve that by reaſon of the diſcontinued, or partial circumvallation, which the Engliſh had made about that town, the French were encouraged to ſteal their troops into it; and that this gave occaſion to a conſiderable action: 'For, the 'Count de Clermont, having got a body of troops at 'Blois, to guard a convoy to Orleans, had infor'mation that Faſtolff was upon the road, conducting 'proviſions from Paris to the camp. He gave no'tice of it to the Count de Dunois, and deſired him 'to make a ſally out of Orleans, and carry off that 'convoy. The Count de Dunois came out accord'ingly with his horſe, paſſed the forts, and joined 'Count de Clermont's army at Jenville; and their 'troops, thus joined, amounted to four thouſand 'men. On the 12th of February, they ſet forward to 'meet Faſtolff, and came up with him, and he ranged 'his troops behind his carriages. The French immedi'ately fell upon them with their cannon, and, if they 'had continued in that manner to ſhatter in pieces 'their waggons, which ſerved as entrenchments, they 'had been infallibly loſt; but the impatience of John 'Stuart, Conſtable of Scotland, and his brother Wil'liam, was the cauſe of the ill ſucceſs that happened. 'They cried out, that it was now time to give battle, 'and lighting from their horſes, with the Scotchmen 'under their command, they marched up to the breach. 'The French were obliged to follow them; but, the 'Engliſh archers having ſuffered them to draw near, 'made their diſcharge upon them at a ſmall diſtance, 'and cut off moſt of them who were placed in the 'firſt ranks. Faſtolff, at the ſame time, having or'dered ſome of his battalions to advance with their 'ſwords and axes in hand, forced their aſſailants to 'retire. The horſe, which were to have ſuſtained the 'attack, inſtead of keeping their ground, when they 'ſaw the foot give way, betook themſelves to flight, 'and the Engliſh, purſuing, utterly routed them. There 'were five or ſix hundred French and Scots left upon 'the field; the two Stuarts ſuffered the puniſhment 'of their imprudence, and were ſlain, with ſeveral 'other Lords and Gentlemen. The Count de Dunois 'was dangerouſly wounded: however, he got toge'ther the remains of his routed army, and re-entered 'Orleans, by paſſing between the intermediate forts, 'which had been built by the Engliſh. His arrival 'a little recovered the townſmen from the conſterna'tion they were in upon the news of this overthrow, 'which the beſiegers had mightily augmented. This 'engagement was called, "The Battle of the Her'rings;" becauſe, among the proviſions which Faſtolff 'was carrying to the camp, there were a great many 'barrels of herrings (70).' One of the old French Hiſtorians makes the number of the ſlain much ſmaller. By this author we are informed, that Faſtolff in his return with his ſaid convoy from Paris to Orleans, was met near Janville and encountered by the Duke of Bourbon, and his army, which was much more numerous than the Engliſh. There they had very many and deſperate ſkirmiſhes. Stuart, the Conſtable of Scotland, and the Sieur D'Orval were killed, and about two hundred men in their company: then Faſtolff and his troops proceeded on their march to Orleans (71). This laſt account, however, may very well be reconciled with the other before quoted, which reckons their loſs at five or ſix hundred men, and even with that here under recited, which computes the ſaid loſs at near three times this number; if we but underſtand that the leſs number which fell, was meant to have been in the particular regiments of Stuart and D'Orval only, the other, of the whole French and Scotch army in general. But there is a more diſtinct hiſtory of theſe times, compiled by one who was then alive; was preſent at moſt of the important occurrences in them, and had greater advantages of knowing the truth of this action than any others who have written of it. This was Peter Baſſet, ſome time gentleman of the bed-chamber to King Henry V. (72), who in his ſaid hiſtory, which was never printed, written alſo in French, though with a Latin title, has been much more accurate in ſome circumſtances of this engagement than the reſt. He agrees, it was in the time of Lent that this convoy was ſo reſolutely defended by Faſtolff through the French army to the Engliſh camp; which accounts for the great quantities of fiſh there were among the other proviſions in it: that Sir Thomas Rampſton with his ſoldiers were alſo joined to him in this charge, and likewiſe Sir Simon Morheir, Provoſt of Paris, with his band of croſs-bows, and a party of the Regent's houſehold-troops; but that, in all, they were not more than fifteen hundred men of arms; and, when they were departed from Janville en Beauſſe, on a very froſty morning, towards the ſiege, and were arrived near Rouvroy, they diſcovered the enemy approaching to the number, as well French as Scots, of about nine or ten thouſand men; where, among other Lords and Nobles, were Charles the eldeſt ſon of the Duke of Bourbon, Sir William Stuart, &c. whereupon Faſtolff drew up his men in battle array, planted before the archers a palliſade, or entrenchment of ſharp-pointed ſtakes, to obſtruct the French cavalry from over-bearing them, and chained or bound all his loaded cars and carriages of proviſions and artillery together as a more ſubſtantial bulwark or encloſure againſt the cannon of the enemy; who, when they approached, were received with ſuch inceſſant and vigorous activity, that the French were totally defeated and diſperſed. Sir William Stuart and his brother, with abundance more, as well French as Scots, to the number of about twenty-five hundred, were left dead in the field, and not one Engliſhman of any diſtinction, or above the common rank, loſt life; but Faſtolff carried his troops, his proviſions, ammunition, &c. ſafe to the ſaid ſiege (73), and this battle has been very juſtly admired, no leſs for the extraordinary conduct of it, than its ſucceſs; it being almoſt incredible that fifteen hundred Engliſh, under the fatigue of a march, encumbered with the charge of a large quantity of proviſions, ſhould gain a complete victory over nine or ten thouſand of the enemy, who attacked them, under the conduct of the firſt perſons of diſtinction; and kill twenty-five hundred of them on the ſpot, without the loſs of a ſingle ſoldier of reputation (74).

(69) By Monſtrelet, Father Daniel, &c. who ſay, that Gen. Glacidas was killed at this ſiege, in 1429. But we know of no ſuch Engliſh name; nor cou'd it be meant for Sir Thomas Gargrave, who was then alſo ſlain there; he being of an eminent family in Yorkſhire: but there was William Gladſdale, a Commander of great bravery, then likewiſe killed in defending a caſtle; whom we take to be this Glacidas. ruin would be the conſequence of a raſh reſiſtance, and that all would be loſt, made the beſt retreat they could, and, among them who ſaved themſelves, as it is ſaid, was Sir John Faſtolff; who, with ſuch as could eſcape, retired to Corbeil (f); thus avoiding being killed, or, with the great Lord Talbot, Lord Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Rampſton, taken priſoner of war. Here the French tales, which ſome Engliſh Hiſtorians have inconſiderately credited, contradict or invalidate themſelves; for, after having made the Regent moſt improbably, and without any examination, or defence, diveſt Faſtolff of his honours [I], they no leſs ſuddenly reſtore him to them, for, as they phraſe it, 'apparent cauſes of good excuſe (g); though againſt the mind of the Lord 'Talbot;' between whom, there had been, it ſeems, ſome emulous conteſts, and, therefore, it is no wonder, that Faſtolff found him, upon this occaſion, an adverſary. It is not likely that the Regent ever conceived any diſpleaſure at this conduct, becauſe Faſtolff was not only continued in military and civil employments of the greateſt concern, but appears more in favour with the Regent after the battle of Patay than before. So that, rather than any diſhonour here can be allowed, the retreat itſelf, as it is told, muſt be doubted. It was but in 1430 that he preferred him to the Lieutenancy of Caen in Normandy (h). In 1432 he accompanied him into France, and was ſoon after ſent ambaſſador to the Council of Baſil, and choſen, in the like capacity, to negociate a final or temporary peace with France (i). And that year, Faſtolff, with the Lord Willoughby, commanded the army which aſſiſted the Duke of Bretagne againſt the Duke of Alençon (k). Soon after this he was, for a ſhort ſpace, in England; or, in 1433, going abroad again, he conſtituted John Faſtolff, of Olton, probably a

[I] Diveſt Faſtolff of his honours.] However ſome of our hiſtorians have been unwarily miſled by French writers, this may certainly be accounted worthy of remembrance among thoſe retreats which have met with great applauſe from men of the greateſt military ſkill and experience (75). Leaders to a battle, often improve every ſtep they take according as circumſtances vary. The very motion of an army in different poſitions, or more advantageous places; the ſurprize of an enemy, diſappointed of ſuccours or ſupplies; the inequality of numbers that attack him, which may fall ſo heavy upon one part of the army, that the other cannot relieve it; the diſcovery of unexpected reſerves, ambuſcades, or new recruits, may furniſh a commander with good reaſons for new reſolutions that may reverſe his proceedings; ſo that even a haſty retreat may be more honourable than an obſtinate perſeverance to unavoidable ruin; and ſurely, in caſes of inevitable neceſſity, a General, whoſe courage is duly tempered with caution, will not hazard a general loſs without ſome apparent proſpect of advantage; but conclude, that, a prudent retreat will be more commendable than a diſhonourable overthrow. That this was the caſe here is evident, in that the Regent was ſo far from depriving Sir John Faſtolff of his George and Garter, before any examination, and reſtoring them after one, or any other way diminiſhing or degrading him of his honour, that he was continually to his death making additions to it; and, more frequently now, more ſignally, after this conduct at the Battle of Patay, in which the Engliſh had ſuch a vaſt inferiority of ſo many thouſand forces, than before. This were enough to clear his reputation, without any other argument; but, hear what an able judge of theſe matters has ſaid upon this occaſion.

(75) See Sir Walter Raleigh's Hiſt. of the World, lib. v. c. ii. ſect. 8. and Geo. Chapman's Dedic. of his Tranſlat. of Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice to the Earl of Somerſet: wherein he celebrates the brave and memorable retreat of Sir John Norris, before Ghent, with a thouſand men, through the whole Spaniſh army, under the Duke of Parma, for three miles together.

'A charge of ſo high a nature, and ſuch a ſevere animadverſion, ſhould have been vouched by authentick contemporary writers; and untill ſuch ſhall be produced, let us conſider what abſurd conſequences are neceſſarily implied in this cenſure; and whether theſe do not afford us reaſonable preſumptions to doubt the truth of this tradition: and here, to omit that the image of St. George was not, in all probability, a ſymbol of the Order in that age; and admitting that thoſe words of the later Hiſtorians ſhould be conſtrued only to mean that the Croſs of St. George, an enſign of it, was taken from him; it will be, however, confeſſed, that this Duke, then Regent of France, could not conſtitute nor inveſt any perſon with this order, though, by this action, if it ſhould be true, it muſt be allowed that he had an abſolute power to diveſt a companion, and that, without the knowledge of the ſovereign, or any concurrence of the other Knights; and, which is the more incredible, that he actually exerciſed this power upon an information only, without hearing or examining into the truth of the charge, or complaint; which ſeems not conſiſtent with the honour, generoſity, and exalted character of this Regent, who had the greateſt reverence for this Order (76), and was a moſt punctual obſerver of its ſtatutes (77), as appears from ſeveral circumſtances: and it is very ſurpriſing, that this moſt heroic Duke, who eſteemed himſelf limited and circumſcribed to the ſtatutes, in the caſe of the election of our knight, ſhould be on a leſs guard in depoſing him, and thereby caſting on him an indellible infamy, by a voluntary power not allowed by the ſtatutes then in being; for, the degradation of a Knight who ſhould fly from battle was an article firſt inſerted into the ſtatutes made by King Henry VIII. which too is there reſtrained: if it ſhould pleaſe the Sovereign and the Company in the next chapter.'

But taking it for granted, as the ſame author proceeds, 'that the Regent, upon the firſt repreſentation, ſhould have been ſo far warmed, as, under that impreſſion, to declare, that our Knight might in his opinion deſerve to be degraded for this his ſuppoſed demerit; or, in the higheſt extent, as theſe authors deliver it, the enſigns of the order were actually demanded and taken from him, yet this haſty poſſeſſion of the Regent cannot be conſtrued to be any diminution of the character of our knight, ſince theſe ſame hiſtorians inform us, that, after an examination of this charge, thoſe enſigns were reſtored him, as they word it, "for apparent cauſes of good excuſe, though againſt the mind of the Lord Talbot," who muſt have been a powerful adverſary. And though we have not the particulars of his vindication, or ſpecification of his conduct, yet ſuch an honourable acquittal, under theſe circumſtances, gives reaſonable grounds to preſume, that this ſudden accuſation had no pretence of foundation, but was a cauſeleſs defamation, and that his retiring was irreproachable. But it is the greateſt degree of evidence, that this Regent was fully convinced, and ſatisfied in the management of our Knight, in this critical nice juncture, in that he afterwards continued to employ him in military and civil adminiſtrations of the higheſt importance, &c.' (78) as we have inſtanced by many examples in the text above, which ſufficiently prove, that he never could have been preferred to thoſe honourable employments, commands in the army, and offices of truſt, if ever he had been ſo degraded, diſhonoured, or diſgraced; not to mention that the Black-book of the Garter, conſtantly after this pretended degradation, mentions Sir John's preſence at, or abſence from, the feaſts of St. George and Chapters of the Order till his death, in the ſame manner as it does in reſpect to the other knights.

near relation, his General Attorney (l). In 1434, or the beginning of the year after, Sir John was again with the Regent of France; and, in 1435, he was again one of the ambaſſadors to conclude a peace with France (m). Towards the latter end of this year, the Regent died at Rouen, 'deſervedly reckoned among the greateſt men 'of his age,' ſays a French Hiſtorian (n); and, as the greateſt proof he could give of his confidence in the honour and integrity of Sir John Faſtolff, he made him one of the executors of his laſt will (o) [K]. Richard, Duke of York, who ſucceeded in the Regency of France, made Faſtolff a grant of an annuity of twenty pounds a year of his own eſtate, pro notabili et laudabili ſervicio, ac bono conſilio (p); which is ſufficient to ſhew this Duke's ſentiments alſo of his merits. In 1436, and for about four years longer, he ſeems to have been pretty well ſettled at his government in Normandy; after which, in 1440, he made his final return home, and, loaden with the laurels he had gathered in France, raiſed a new plantation of them in his native country; where he ſhone as bright in virtue as he had in valour, and became as illuſtrious in his domeſtic as he had been in his foreign character [L]. It appears by an extract out of an ancient roll written by Sir William Le Neve, and bound up with ſeveral other things, in a MS. of John Anſtis, Eſq. fol. 289, of Sir William Le Neve's hand writing; that in a cauſe between the Lord Lewis of Luxemburgh, Epiſcopus Mo . . . . ., and Chancellor of France, Sir John Faſtolff and Sir Andrew Ogard, Knights, were executors of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, &c. concerning the taking the Duke of Alençon priſoner; Sir John Faſtolff, Knight, late Maſter of the Houſehold of the late Duke of Bedford, ſaith that . . . . Scales and . . . . . took the Duke, and that Sir John Faſtolff had the half of 10,000 livers. See before note D. William Worceſter ſays, "My lord Bedford's will was made in ſo brief and general terms, that unto this day, by the ſpace of 20 years, can never have end, but always new to conſtrue and opinionable; ſo a generality ſhall nor may be ſo good as a particular declaration (79)."

[L] Became as illuſtrious in his domeſtic as he had been in his foreign character.] As his valour made him a terror in war, his humanity made him a bleſſing in peace: all we can find in his retirement, being elegant, hoſpitable, and generous, either as to the places of his abode, or thoſe perſons and foundations on which he ſhowered his bounty. The ſtreams of his treaſure that fed this fountain of his munificence were numerous and plentiful; as may be ſeen in the jury's return to the writ of enquiry into the lands and eſtates whereof he was poſſeſſed at his death (80) in Norfolk, Suffolk, Yorkſhire, and Wiltſhire. He was a benefactor to both the Univerſities; bequeathing a conſiderable legacy to Cambridge, for building the ſchools of Philoſophy and Law (81), for which the firſt order under their Chancellor Laurence, Biſhop of Durham, is dated in June, 1458; and, at Oxford, he was ſo bountiful to Magdalen College, through the affection he had for his friend William Wainfleet, the founder thereof two years before, that his name is commemorated in an anniverſary ſpeech: and though the particulars of his bounty are not now remembered, becauſe he enfeoffed the ſaid founder in his life-time, yet it is known, that the boar's head in Southwark, now divided into tenements, yielding one hundred and fifty pounds yearly, together with Caldecot manor in Suffolk, were part of the lands he beſtowed thereon; and Lovingland in that county is conceived alſo to have been another part of his donation (82). There had been an ancient free chapel of St. John the Baptiſt in the manor houſe at Caſtre, the antient ſeat of his family, as early as the reign of Edward I. (83). Sir John intended to have erected a college for ſeven monks or ſecular prieſts (one of whom to be head), and ſeven poor men; and to endow it with 120 marks rent charge, out of ſeveral manors which he gave or ſold to his couſin John Paſton, ſenior, eſq. charged with this charity. Mr. Paſton laboured to eſtabliſh this pious foundation till his death, 6 Ed. IV. as did his ſon Sir John Paſton, knight, but whether it was ever incorporated and fully ſettled Biſhop Tanner doubts (84), as there is no farther mention of it in the rolls or the Biſhop of Norwich's regiſtry. Only in the valuation, 26 Hen. VIII, there is ſaid to have been in Caſtre hall a chantry of the foundation of Sir John Faſtolff, Knight, worth 2l. 13s. 4d. per ann. 6 Ed. IV. from receipts it appears that the prieſts had in money, beſides their diet, 40l. per ann. and the poor men 40s. per ann. each (85). See his letter about it to his couſin John Paſton, &c. (86), and of the high price demanded for a licence to amortiſe lands for it, ſee a letter from Henry Filongley a lawyer, and his nephew (87); ſee alſo a letter about a charter for it from Henry Windſor, one of his houſehold (88). The foundation was certainly not completed till after his deceaſe; for, William Worceſter, in a letter to Margaret Paſton in 1466, tells her he had communed with her ſon whether it ſhould not be at Cambridge in caſe it ſhall not be at Caſtre, neither at St. Benet's [in the Holme], and that the biſhop of Wincheſter [Wainflete] was diſpoſed to found a college in Oxford for his ſayd mayſter to be prayed for, yet with much leſs coſt he might make ſome other memorial in Cambridge (89).

Among the men of learning whom he patronized may be reckoned William Worceſter above named. He was learned in Hiſtory, Antiquities, and Heraldry, Phyſick, and Aſtronomy. He is called in old writings not only ſervant, and foget, or ſubject, to Sir John Faſtolff, but was his purſuivant and ſecretary (90). Many of his letters to his maſter, as he calls him, are ſtill in being (91). But that he was Sir John's Herald, by ſuch a title, or diſtinction, as Botoner, from the croſs croſlets botonée, in our knight's arms, is a miſconjecture in Mr. Anſtis (92), no leſs than is that of Mr. Lewis, who fancies, becauſe this learned writer was converſant in medicinal ſtudies, that he was therefore called a Botaner, or Herbaliſt (93). Whereas we may gather from his own writings, that he was born at Briſtol about 1415 (94); that his father's name was Worceſter, and his mother's Botoner (95), hence he often names himſelf William Wyrceſter, alias Botoner; and hence the error in Pits (96), and others, of making two diſtinct perſons of the two names. He ſtudied at Hart Hall, Oxford, 1434. He had been exerciſed in wars above 44 years (97); and had ſo faithfully ſerved Sir John Faſtolff that he left him one of his executors. He wrote many books, the firſt of which, that was printed, was his tranſlation from the French, of "Cicero de Senectute," which he addreſſed to William Wainfleet, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and will be farther quoted in the next note. He tells us that he preſented it to the biſhop at Aſher [Eſher] Auguſt 10, 1475, but received no reward (nullum regardum recepi de epiſcopo). He wrote alſo "Antiquities of England;" "Abbreviations of the learned;" "Medicinal Collections;" a book of Aſtrology; another of Aſtronomy; beſides a particular treatiſe, gratefully preſerving the life and deeds of his maſter, under the title of "Acta Domini Johannis Faſtolff (98);" the "Acts of John Duke of Bedford;" "Polyandrium Oxonienſium, or Memoirs of Oxford Students;" and other leſſer pieces; of which ſee Tanner Bibl. Brit. p. 115 (99). His "Annals of England" were printed by Hearne at the end of his "Liber Niger Scaccarii," p. 424-451. His "Itinerary" was publiſhed from a MS, not improbably the original, in the Library at Corpus Chriſti College, Cambridge, by Mr. James Naſmith, fellow of the ſaid college, Cantab. 1778, 8vo. In 1450, he conveyed to John Kemp, Cardinal Archbiſhop of York, and others, his manor of Caſtre in Fleg, and ſeveral other lands ſpecified in the deed of conveyance (q). The ſame year, Nov. 8, the king by writ directed Richard Waller, Eſq. At length being arrived, in the year 1459, beyond the venerable age of fourſcore years [M], he ſays of himſelf, that he was 'In good remembrance, albeit I am gretly vexid with ſickeneſſe, and 'thurgh age infebelyd (s).' ſuppoſed to have died about 1490 (100). The ſon of this Worceſter, among other things, alſo made a collection of ſeveral authentic inſtruments relating to the Engliſh wars and government in France; which he dedicated to king Edward IV. wherein is a catalogue of the Princes, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Bannerets, Knights, and other perſons of eminence, who were of the Regent's court: Therin are enumerated Faſtolff's poſts of honour, and the places under his government; he is ſtyled Knight-Banneret; Baron of Cilliguillim; Steward, or Marſhal, of the Regent's houſehold; the King's Lieutenant of Normandy for one year, and, after, Governor of Anjou and Maine, for many years; Captain of the City of Mans, and the caſtles and towns of Alançon, Mayn, Freſney le Vicont, for fourteen years, likewiſe of Cane, Verneiul, and Hunflue, ſome years. In this book are ſeveral public memorials, concerning the grand articles and negociations of peace and war; with ſome ordinances compoſed in French, and iſſued forth, by our no leſs politic than heroic Knight, of whom the collector remarks, that, if theſe his counſels, inſtructions, and admonitions, had been duly obſerved, they would have prevented many miſcarriages, which might conduce to our loſs of France. A copy of this collection, in quarto, was ſome time in the cuſtody of the late Brian Fairfax, Eſq. one of the Commiſſioners of the Cuſtoms.

[M] Beyond the venerable age of fourſcore years.] This may be computed from the time of his birth as mentioned at the beginning of this article. For the ſake of an even number, two or three odd years are omitted in the following character and account of him publiſhed before a tranſlation of Cicero de Senectute, made at the command of John Lord Tiptoft Earl of Worceſter, into whoſe family Faſtolff had married, and printed by our firſt printer, about twenty-two years after his death, in theſe words.—— 'Whiche 'book was tranſlated, and thy ſtoryes openly declared, 'by the ordenaunce and deſyre of the noble auncyent 'Knyght, Syr Johan Faſtolff, of the countee of Norfolk, Banneret, lyvying the age of fourſcore yere; 'exercyſying the warrys in the Royame of Fraunce, 'and other countrees, for the diffence of unyverſal 'welfare of both Royames of England and Fraunce, 'by forty yeres endurying, the fayte of armes haun'tyng, and in admynyſtryng juſtice, and polytique 'governaunce, under thre Kyngs; that is to wete, 'Henry IV. Henry V. Henry VI. and was Governour 'of the Duchey of Angeou, and the Countee of Mayne; 'Capytayne of many Townys, Caſtellys, and For'treſſys, in the ſaid Royame of Fraunce; havying the 'charge and ſaufguard of them dyverſe yeres; acu'pyeng and rewlynge thre hondred ſperes, and the 'bowes accuſtomed thenne; and yeldying good acompt 'of the foreſaid Townes, Caſtellys, and Fortreſſes, to 'the ſeyd Kyngs, and to theyr Lyeutenauntes, Pryn'ces of noble recommendation; as, Johan, Regent 'of Fraunce, Duc of Bedford; Thomas, Duc of Ex'eter; Thomas, Duc of Clarence, and other Lyeute'nantes (101).'

[N] Of his will we ſhall give ſome extract below.] It was written in Latin, and a fair copy of it, not very correct, we have ſeen, as alſo a tranſlation or abſtract in Engliſh: but in neither is it expreſſed who the witneſſes were, nor what the arms, or figure of the ſeal. It bears date, on the Sunday after the Feaſt of All Saints, in November, 1459, and ſets forth, that the ſaid Sir John Faſtolff, Knight, of the county of Norfolk, and in the dioceſe of Norwich, made and publiſhed this his laſt will and teſtament in his Manor of Caſtre, within the ſaid dioceſe, in the following manner. Firſt, he commends his ſoul to God, to the Virgin Mary, and to all the Saints; and bequeathes his body to be buried, after his death, in the conventual church of the monaſtery of St. Bennet in the Holmes, in the ſaid dioceſe, under the arch of the new chapel, which he lately rebuilt there, on the ſouth ſide of the choir or chancel, under a marble tomb, near the body of Milicent his former conſort, who lies interred there. He farther ordains, that the abbot, and the ſaid convent, ſhall give ſecurity, before his interment, that they will grant and confirm to John Paſton, and to ſuch others as ſhall be nominated by him, full power of granting the lands, &c. which the ſaid John Paſton and other feoffees of the ſaid Sir John Faſtolff, or their feoffees, hold of the ſaid abbot and convent, to ſeven monks, or prieſts, and their ſucceſſors, towards endowing and eſtabliſhing a College, within the manor and lordſhip of Caſtre; or ſo much of the land as the ſaid Sir John Faſtolff ſhall think fit. Likewiſe orders, that all his debts ſhould be paid, and all forfeitures fully compenſated, reſtored, and ſatisfied. He bequeaths towards the repair and ſupport of the harbour of Great Yarmouth, and towards renewing and repairing the walls of the ſaid town, for the public benefit or conſervation of the town, and the adjacent country, one hundred marks; on condition, that the burgeſſes and governors thereof ſhall, without delay, proceed to the ſaid reparations, that the inhabitants may pray for the repoſe of his ſoul. He gives to the pariſh churches of the ſeveral villages, wherein he had either ſeat, manor, lands, or tenements, a ſilk gown, to celebrate maſs and pray for his ſoul in, and directs that there ſhould be erected in thoſe churches his atchievement of arms, embroidered at the diſcretion of his executors, and ſo as were moſt convenient to or becoming thoſe churches. He bequeathes to his tenants and menial ſervants a competent reward out of his goods and chattels, to the ſum of three hundred marks, according to their rank, condition, and merits; and ſo as his gentleman or valets may have a proportion double to the reſt; more eſpecially regarding thoſe who conſtantly attended him, in all perils and dangers, in ſickneſs and health. He likewiſe gives to all the orders of religious and mendicant friers, both in Great-Yarmouth and the city of Norwich, that they may offer their prayers for his ſoul, a ſufficient ſum, according to the diſcretion of his executors; on condition that the partakers thereof have no property, but depend upon the alms and charity of good Chriſtians for their ſupport. He bequeathes the reſidue of his goods, &c. after all debts, legacies, and charges are cleared, to his executors hereafter named; that they may diſtribute them according to diſcretion, and ſo as to promote the ſalvation of his ſoul, among the fitteſt objects of charity, the poor, infirm, lame, blind, thoſe confined to their beds, and who cannot maintain themſelves or their family: but ſtill to prefer his poor relations, neighbours, and thoſe who were known to him; and died at his ſeat at Caſtre the next day after, being the feſtival of St. Leonard, or the eve before, as appears in the Eſcheats (w), in the 39th or laſt year of king Henry the VIth's reign, and no leſs than thirty-ſix years beyond the extravagant period aſſigned by Fuller (x). He was buried with great ſolemnity under an arch, in a chapel of our lady of his own building (y) on the South ſide of the choir at the abbey-church of St. Bennet in the Holm, in Norfolk, which was ruined at the diſſolution; and ſo much was he reſpected [O] after his deceaſe, that John Beauchamp, Lord of Powyke, in his laſt will dated the 15th of Edward IV (z), appointed a chantry, more eſpecially for the ſoul of Sir John Faſtolff. Some eſtimate of his landed property may be formed from a paper below [P].

him; or where he had any lordſhips, manors, lands, or tenements; and, for repairing of churches in the ſaid towns and villages; alſo the public roads and bridges, and other charitable uſes, eſpecially in Norfolk and Suffolk: and that one thouſand marks or pounds be laid out, within a year, upon his funeral, his legacies and other charities aforeſaid: and that five hundred and thirty three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight-pence, ſhall be laid out annually, ſo far as his goods, lands, &c. by ſale ſhall amount to, till they are fully diſpoſed of; and he exhorts, in the name of Jeſus Chriſt, that this truſt be ſincerely and faithfully diſcharged by his executors; and as he would in conſcience, reaſon and juſtice, do for them in like caſe; and as they will anſwer for the contrary at the tremendous tribunal of God. Then he conſtitutes William Biſhop of Wincheſter, John Lord Beauchamp, Nicholas, abbot of Langly, John Stokes, Doctor of Laws, Frier John Brackley, Doctor of Divinity; William Yelverton, one of the King's Judges, John Paſton, Eſq. Henry Filongly, Eſq. Thomas Howes, Prieſt, and William Worceſtre, to be the executors of this his laſt will. And the execution thereof he thus declares limited: that the ſaid John Paſton, and Thomas Howes, ſhall have the adminiſtration and diſpoſition of the movable goods, money, &c. which ſhall ariſe from the ſale of his lands, and the produce thereof, and they only, to diſpoſe of the ſaid effects for the benefit of his ſoul; and none of the reſt to concern themſelves in diſpoſing of his ſaid goods, &c. unleſs they are requeſted to aid and aſſiſt them; and that none of the reſt ſhall ſell, receive, or diſtribute any of his effects, without the conſent of thoſe two; nor any of them interfere in the adminiſtration while thoſe are alive; hoping they will not refuſe their aid when it is requeſted. But, if either of thoſe two decline, or refuſe to act and officiate, or ſhould die before the complete execution of his will, then he of the two who is willing to adminiſter, or does ſurvive, ſhall aſſociate one of the other executors, whom he thinks moſt fitting and capable. So, as often as one dies, or declines the truſt, the other ſhall elect one of the reſt. But, where both ſhall refuſe to act, or both die, before a ſubſtitute is choſen, then ſuch two of the ſurvivors, as ſhall have a majority of ſuffrages among themſelves, are allowed to adminiſter; and the two thus choſen may, as they ſee occaſion, conſult with the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Lord Beauchamp, the Abbot of Langley, Frier Brackley, Yelverton, Filongley, and William Worceſter. He farther appoints Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Walter Biſhop of Norwich, Maſter Robert Popy, Chancellor, and Hugh Fen, to be Superviſors of this his laſt will; and deſires that the two acting executors may receive ſuch recompence for their trouble as the ſaid Biſhop of Winton and John Stokes, or the major part of the ſurvivors, ſhall think fit. He alſo ordains that the ſuperviſors of his will, and the other executors ſhall receive ſuch reward for their trouble as the two acting executors ſhall account fully proportionable thereto: and that, if any of the ſaid executors ſhall obſtruct or moleſt the ſaid John Paſton and Thomas Howes in the due execution of their truſt, or incur any of the offences before mentioned, they ſhall be diſcharged from having any concern therein: or, if they are troubleſome before they ſhall be admitted to a ſhare in the execution, he wills and ordains, that every ſuch delinquent ſhall be declared and held incapable of ſuch truſt, and be excluded from any ſhare in it. Dated in the year, &c. abovementioned. He left coin by him 2,643 l. 10s.—Gold plate, divers pieces, weight 10lb.; his ſilver plate weighed at the ſcale amounted to 1225lb. 404½, or 99 ſtone 1lb. 8½oz., reckoning Troy weight, 120z to the pound, and 12 to the ſtone. 20 l. was given to build a new window in Wendling abbey. 24 l. to Bromholm priory. 80 l. lent to Langley abbey. Yelverton, his executor, is blamed for giving a receipt to Biſhop Wainflete for 442 marks of Sir John's money. Grey, Biſhop of Ely, had 140. Butler, earl of Wiltſhire, a legacy of 27 l. and two gallon pots, weighing twelve ſcore ounces of ſilver. Nevill, earl of Saliſbury, 165 l. 23 oz. of gold, and 3033 oz. of ſilver, were ſold by his executors, who had large ſums in their hands. Thomat Howes, one of them, confeſſor to Sir John, a grey frier, rector of Caſtlecomb, Wilts, and of Blofield and Pulham, Norfolk, had in his hands about 4000l. to lay out in repairs and ornaments of churches and collegiate houſes. He repaired the church and chancel of Pulham St. Mary, and in a South window ſet up the figures of Sir John and his lady, with their arms and this inſcription: "Orate pro animabus Joh'is Faſtolf, militis, qui multa "bona fuit in tempore vite, & Milecentiæ uxoris ejus, "& domini Thome Howes, iſtius eccl'ie rectoris, et om- "nium fidelium defunctorum. Howes appears to have been one of Faſtolff's moſt truſty and faithful ſervants and executors. Several letters, to and from him, are printed in the Paſton collection, and many more remain in MS.

[O] And ſo much was he reſpected.] In one of Mr. Aſhmole's choice old volumes of MSS. lately in the poſſeſſion of a noble peer (102), to whom we have been beholden for many extracts out of it, there is a conciſe character of our hero, written in the reign of king Henry VII. by a knight who was then King of Arms, wherein Sir John Faſtolff is called "a rich knight, 'and a grete bilder; having bilded Caſter-Hall, in 'Northfolk, a royal palace in Southwork, and another in Yermouth: a ſpeciall goode maiſter to the 'Officers of Armes, and was moſt triumphantly 'brought in erthe, that I have heard of any man of 'his degre.'

In ſome old books of Heraldry, his arms have been erroneouſly blazoned; for, Faſtolff bears Or and Azure, quarterly- on a bend Gules, three Croſſets Argent; and not Eſcallops, according to the deſcription we meet with in ſome pedigrees of the family; as may be proved not only from ſeveral original ſeals of the Faſtolffs ſtill in being, but in the old arms which remain carved in ſtone over a window of his houſe at Caſtre by Yarmouth, engraved by Mr. Anſtis at the head of his memoirs of him. This coat is on a ſeal of Faſtolff's mother to a deed 1404, and occurs on a ſeal 1432, 11 Hen. VI. circumſcribed S. iohannis faſtolff, ſupported by two eagles volant holding labels and ſprigs under a helmet and torſe ſupporting a plume of feathers. Mr. Aſhmole ſays his cognizance was a Book with a Pencil in it; and a Shield with a branch of Laurel flouriſhing out of it.

[P] Of his landed property may be formed from a paper below.] July 7, 1448, Sir John Faſtolff, knight, made maſter Robert Pepys clerk, Nicholas Bocyns, John Gerrard, William Worceſter, William Barker, Jeffry Spyrlyng, and William Wirmegeye, his attorneys, to deliver ſeizin to his feoffees, John, Cardinal Archbiſhop of York, John, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William, Biſhop of Lincoln, William, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Adam, Biſhop of Cheſter, Richard, Duke of York, Ralf Lord Cromwell, Ralf Lord Sudley, John Lord Beau-

The ruins of his houſe at Caſtre ſtill remaining ſhew it to have been alike capacious and ſtrong. It was moated round, but the moat is now for the moſt part filled up. The grand entrance was on the Weſt. The houſe formed a rectangled parallelogram; the South and North ſides longer than Eaſt and Weſt; the ſtables in front; the beſt rooms on the right hand of the ſquare, under which ſide is a noble vault, and over it probably the hall. The embatteled brick tower at the North Weſt corner is ſtanding, above one hundred feet high; and over one of the windows were carved his arms in the Garter as above deſcribed, ſupported by angels, now removed; on one of the doors a ſaltire engrailed. To it adjoined a dining-parlour, fifty-nine feet long, and twenty-eight broad. Eaſt from the caſtle ſtood the college, forming three ſides of a ſquare larger than the former, with two round towers; the whole converted into barns and ſtables. The caſtle moat is ſaid to have communicated with a navigable creek, and in a farm houſe North Weſt of the manſion called the barge-houſe is ſhewn a large arch, capable of receiving a boat of conſiderable burden (a). Weever (b) ſays he had licence from Henry VI. to build his houſe-caſtle-wiſe as a fortification on that ſide of Yarmouth, to which perhaps relates the licence granted him 1443, 22 Hen. VI. to employ ſome of the King's ſhips (c) to carry materials for building and furniſhing (d) one of his manſion houſes. The current tradition is, that this houſe was erected by a French nobleman, who was taken priſoner by our famous knight, according to the model and architecture of his own caſtle in France, as the price of his ranſom.

Sir John Faſtolff had, by his will, appointed John Paſton, eſq. eldeſt ſon and heir of Sir William Paſton, the judge, one of his executors; and had given to them all his manors, lands, &c. in truſt, to found the college of the ſeven prieſts, and ſeven poor men, in the manor-houſe at Caſtre, &c. "For the ſingular truſt and love," ſays Sir John, "that I have to my couſin John Paſton before all others, being in every "belief that he will execute this my laſt will."

Edward IV. 1464, for 300 marks, 100 in hand, and the remainder when the foundation takes place, granted John Paſton, ſen. eſq. licence to found the college before mentioned, and his favor and protection againſt Yelverton, Jenney, and others (e).

But it appears that this John Paſton, Eſq. had entered on this manor of Caſtre, and was impriſoned in the Fleet of London by Nevill, Biſhop of Exeter, (on Nov. 3, 1464,) then Chancellor. On his death, in 1466, he left it to his eldeſt ſon Sir John Paſton. July 6, 1466, the king granted him a warrant under his hand and privy ſeal, to take poſſeſſion of all the lands and inheritance of his late father, or of Agnes his grandmother, or of Margaret his mother, or of William Paſton, and Clement Paſton, his uncles; alſo the manor and place of Caſtre, or of any other eſtate which his father had, by way of gift, or purchaſe, of the late Sir John Faſtolff; which lands had been ſeized by the king, on evil ſurmiſes made to him, againſt his deceaſed father, himſelf and uncles, of all which they were ſufficiently, openly, and worſhipfully cleared before the king. "So that all yee now being in the ſaid place of Caſter, or in any "liſlihode, late the Sir John Paſton's, by way of giſt or purchaſe, of the late "Sir John Faſtolff, that was ſeized into our hands, avoid the poſſeſſion of the ſame, and William Toyle, Clement Denſton. Thomas Lucham, Thomas Howys, clerks; Thomas Weſt, Eſq. William Wangford, Nicholas Gyrlyngton, William Genneye and Thomas Grene, in his manors of Caſter by Great Yarmouth, called Kedham's, Vaux's, and Boſung; with the vowſon of the chapel of St. John Baptiſt in Caſtor, the manor of Heryngby, and twenty marks annual rent, paid by the Prior of Hickling out of his manor called Netherhall in Hickling, which belongs to that convent. The third part of Runham manor, Begryles manor in Wynterton, Redham hall in Boyton, the manor of Windham with the advowſon of St. Ethelbert's church there, the manor of Heyleſdon and the advowſon of the church, and the advowſons of the two chauntry prieſts in that church, and Heyleſdep water-mills, the manor and advowſon of Drayton, the manor of Tolthorp, and the advowſon of the mediety of Taverham, and the manor and advowſon of Heynford, Gutton manor in Brandeſton with the advowſon of the church, the manor of Bliclyng, Laund hall manor in Saxthorp, and the water-mill, and the manor of Tichewell; and all his eſtates in Caſtre, Great Yarmouth, Ormeſby, Scrowteby, Malteby, Winterton, Somerton, Martham, Ballwick, Reppes, Hykelyng, Stokeſby, Hardingby, Runham, Thrykeby, Fylby, Mundham, Syſlonde, Sethyng, Lodne, Hyleſdone, Catton, Horſtede, Felthorp, Erlham, Upper and Lower Erlham, Drayton, Taverham, Attlebrigge, Brandeſton, Boton, Salle, Cauſton, Heynford, Bliclyng, Saſcthorp, Corpeſy, Itryngham, Irminglond, Heydon, Bryſton, Wolterton, Fichewell, Brancaſtre, Chöſel, Thorneham, Dockyng, Beyton, Acle and Byrlyngham or Elſewhere, in Norfolk. And in all his meſſuages, lands, rents, and vices in Norwich and in Caldecoty's manor in Treton, Bradewell manor, Akethorpe manor in Lowiſtoft, Burnevyle's in Nacton, Cotton manor, and in all his eſtates in Tretton, Bradwell, Burghcaſtell, Gatton, Belton, Hopton, Launde, Geldeſton, Lowiſtoft, Coorton, Cotton, Skeyth, Wickham and Naketon in Suffolk, and in his manors of Dedham, Netherhall, and Overhall, and the watermill there in Eſſex; and in his manor or meſſuage in St. Olave's pariſh in Suthwerk near Horſleyedown, in Surrey, formerly Henry Yevele's, and in ſeven meſſuage and 25 land called Dunley's in that pariſh. Among the Paſton papers (III. 260—275) is a ſtatement of the loſſes and damages ſuſtained by him in the king's ſervice, both in and out of the kingdom; whereby it appears, that for fifteen years after his laſt return from France, to his death, he was at great expence in attendances on the king and council, for which, and for all his ſervices to king Henry IV. he had neither fee, wages, rewards, nor recompence. The crown owed him for loans and charges in France not leſs than 4083 l. 15*s.* 7*d.* Ibid. p. 267.

" ſuffer our truly and well beloved Knight, Sir John Paſton, to enjoy the profits thereof, " with all the goods and chattels there, and pay all the iſſues and profits thereof, as " yee did unto his father, at any time in his life."

Soon after this, on Monday before St. Bartholomew's day, 1469, John Mowbray, duke of Norſolk, laid pretenſions to it; and ſent Sir John Heveningham, a couſin of Sir John Faſtolff's, to require John Paſton, eſq. governor of it, being a caſtle well fortified, in the abſence of his eldeſt brother Sir John Paſton, to deliver it up to him; maintaining that the ſaid Duke had purchaſed the ſaid caſtle of William Yelverton [Q], (that curſed Norfolk juſtice, as Worceſter ſtyles him,) whereas Sir John had ordered it not to be ſold but to be a college for prieſts, and an hoſpital for poor men. The ſaid John Paſton refuſing to ſurrender it, the Duke came before it with 3000 armed men, and with guns, culverines, and other artillery, and laid ſiege to it immediately. The names of the principal perſons at this ſiege were John Duke of Norfolk, Sir William Calthorp, Sir John Heveningham, Sir Gilbert Debenham, and his brother ——— Lofday, Sir Thomas Wingefield, and William Brandon, Thomas and William Wingefield, eſq. ——— Swaney, eſq. Hugh Auſtin, eſq. Sir John Waldegrave, William Debenham, jun. eſq. Robert Debenham, eſq. ——— ſon of Sir Lawrence Rayneford, James Radcliffe, eſq. Black John de Radclyffe, Simon Fitzſymons, of Eſſex, eſq. ——— Timperley, eſq. Richard Southwele, eſq. Gilbert Debenham, ſen. eſq. ——— Brook, eſq. ſon of the Lord Cobham, ——— Bardwell of Herling, eſq. Herward by Cromer, eſq. John Ratcliff of Attleburgh, eſq. ——— Lettrum, eſq. of Plumeſtede, and others. The ſiege continued five weeks and three days. The names of the defendants againſt the Duke were, John Paſton, jun. eſq. governor, in the abſence of his brother Sir John; John Daubeney, eſq. who was killed by a ſhell-ſhot (f); Oſbern Berny, eſq. Sander Com, a valet; Oſborn de Caſtre, and other valetti and ſervants; in the whole twenty-eight (g).

February 10, 1474, 13 Ed. IV. an indenture was made between Sir William Yelverton, William Jenny, ſerjeant at law, and William Worceſter, executors of Sir John on one part, and Thomas Cager and Robert Kytton on the other, whereby the ſaid Robert was appointed ſurveyor of the lands and tenements in Southwark, and other places in Surrey, late Sir John's, to perform his laſt will, and alſo receiver of the rents; who was to have ſix marks per annum, and to be allowed beſides all reaſonable coſts, that he ſhall do in the defence and keeping out John Paſton, eſq. and of all others claiming by him.

Anthony, Lord Scales, at another time took poſſeſſion of it in the name of king Edward IV. under pretence that Paſton was the king's villan (though abſolutely falſe), all which proved a great deſtruction to the goods and effects in the ſame; but Sir John Paſton, through the favour and protection of king Edward IV. had afterwards poſſeſſion (h).

Sir John Faſtolff had a houſe at Norwich in Pokethorp oppoſite St. James's church, called Faſtolff's place; in the windows of which Mr. Blomefield ſaw ſeveral paintings of ſaints and ſcripture worthies, and two knights fighting, which he imagined repreſented Sir John and his French priſoner (k). He likewiſe built a ſplendid ſeat in Yarmouth, and a palace in Southwark (l).]

[Q] William Yelverton.] Of Rougham, in the county of Norfolk, was a ſerjeant at law, judge of the King's Bench, 1444, knight of the Bath, 1460, and was living 1467, and related to the Paſtons. He had two wives, and iſſue by both; and, by the laſt, was anceſtor to the preſent earl of Suſſex (103). He acknowledges himſelf greatly obliged to Sir John Faſtolff, whom he calls his " moſte worſhippfull and " beſt betruſted maiſter."

 [This article in the former edition, compoſed by the diligent and inquiſitive Mr. Oldys, has been reviſed and enlarged in the preſent by Mr. Gough, who is poſſeſt of all the papers collected by thoſe able antiquaries, Le Neve, Martin, and Blomefield, which came from Mr. Oldys to the late Mr. Ives of Yarmouth, who ſeems to have intended to form a life of Faſtolff out of them, but was prevented by death. In the firſt volume of Sir John Fenn's " Original Letters " written during the reigns of Henry the Sixth, Ed- " ward the Fourth, and Richard the Third," are two of Sir John Faſtolfe's. They relate to private affairs, and are of little conſequence, any farther than as the former of them ſerves to ſhew ſomething of Faſtolff's diſpoſition (104). There are, likewiſe, three letters addreſſed to Sir John; one by Thomas Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; another by William Botoner, uſually called William Worceſter; and a third by John Bocking. The Archbiſhop's is full of kindneſs and reſpect; the two others give the news of the time (105).

Mr. Capell, in his ſupplement to the firſt volume of his notes on Shakeſpeare (106), has given a paper of conſiderable length, which he entitles, " Anecdotes of " Sir John Faſtolf of Caſtre in Norfolk, whom Shake- " ſpeare calls Falſtaff." This paper was communicated by Lord Dacre, and is chiefly extracted from Mr. Anſtis's hiſtory of the " Order of the Garter," Mr. Parkin's Supplement to Blomefield's " Hiſtory " of Norfolk," and Tanner's " Bibliotheca Britan- " nica." It is, in fact, a life of Sir John Faſtolff; but does not contain any thing very material which is not recited in our work.
